Creating Change: plenary speaker, early registration deadline and more

With just about a week left before the end of early registration on Oct. 31, organizers of the National LGBTQ Task Force’s 2020 Creating Change Conferences, coming to Dallas in January, have announced that the Rev. angel Kyodo williams will be the speaker for the Opening Plenary.

She is also only the second black woman ever recognized as a teacher in the Japanese Zen lineage.

Creating Change 2020 is scheduled for Jan. 15-19 at the Sheraton Dallas Hotel. Creating Change is already the largest LGBTQ activist conference in the country, and organizers said they “expect it will be even bigger [in 2020] because it’s in Texas.”

In collaboration with COLAGE, kids Programming at Creating Change will premiere in Dallas for 25 children, so children ages 8-13 with a LGBTQ parent or guardian at the conference are welcome to register.

Oct. 31 is the last day for early registration for the conference, and those joining COLAGE at the conference are encouraged to register by that deadline, and to use the discount code COLAGE to get a 15 percent discount on the registration costs.

The next Creating Change Conference Host Committee meeting will be Nov. 11, at Resource Center, 5750 Cedar Springs Road. Dinner is at 7 p.m., followed by a business meeting from 7:30-9 p.m. ASL and Spanish language interpretation are provided.

For details on registration, being a community housing host or a volunteer, visit the Creating Change website.

Victory Fund endorses Johnson for re-election

The LGBT Victory Fund has endorsed state Rep. Julie Johnson for re-election in 2020 to the Texas House of Representatives.

In her first election, Johnson defeated Rep. Mat Rinaldi, who authored the bathroom bill. During the 2019 legislative session, she was credited with derailing, via a procedural maneuver, the one anti-LGBT bill that made it to the floor of the House.

Texas Monthly named Johnson one of the 10 best legislators of the session. Johnson represents District 115, which includes Addison, Coppell, Farmers Branch, the Dallas County portion of Carrollton and parts of Irving.

In announcing the endorsement, Victory Fund wrote, “Julie will continue to be a powerful voice for LGBTQ people in Texas.”

LifeWalk 2019 raises $500K+

LifeWalk 2019, held Sunday, Oct. 6, at Turtle Creek Park, raised more than $502,000, event Co-Chair Mark Tribodeau announced via video during a party on Tuesday, Oct. 22, celebrating this year’s successful event. The 2019 total is $100,000 more than the 2018 LifeWalk total, according to organizers, making LifeWalk the largest HIV walk event in Texas.

Proceeds from LifeWalk benefit Prism Health North Texas, which organizes the walk each year, and Prism’s LifeWalk partner agencies, all of which serve people in North Texas impacted by HIV/AIDS. Those partner agencies were AIDS Services of Dallas, Dallas Hope Charities, Dogs Matter, Greg Dollinger Memorial AIDS Fund, Tucker’s Gift and the Turtle Creek Chorale.

Terry Bax and Team Clover set new individual and team fundraising records for the LifeWalk event — $110,000 and $138,000 respectively. Rounding out the top five LifeWalk teams were Turtle Creek Chorale ($54,490), MAC Cosmetics ($43,024), GD-MAF ($28,892) and Guys & Dolls ($24,000).

Bax was also the recipient of the annual Heart & Hands award, PHNTX’s most prestigious award, which is bestowed on an individual who has given significant time, talent and resources to Prism Health North Texas over a decade or more.

Ferris has welcomed gay couple who’ve taken over a 137-year-old business

taffet@dallasvoice.com

When the business opened on the town square in Ferris in 1882, it was known as Green Funeral Home and Hardware. Today it’s just Green Funeral Home.

But Jeremy Lewis and Ben LaFleur do have a related business in downtown Ferris. A Bundle of Love is a florist that provides flowers for its funerals and sells directly to the public but also sells gifts like Tyler Candles, LaFleur Brothers Seasonings and Hops Farm Soap made in flavors like beer.

When Lewis and LaFleur bought the business a year ago, they had architect Mark Nelson tear down walls and modernize the funeral home. And they moved the florist a few doors closer to the town square into a larger space.

Three generations of the Green family operated the funeral home. When Helen Green took over the business, she became one of the first women licensed by the state of Texas to become a funeral director. While the Green family is gone from the business, Lewis and LaFleur respect the company’s history.

Lewis said being a funeral director is something he wanted to do since he was a child. While other kids were playing cops and robbers, he was playing funeral home. And, yes, he does understand how disturbing that is.

When he was 16, he applied to work at a funeral home near his house in Joplin, Mo. They turned him down suggesting the local McDonalds was hiring.

“If I wanted to work at McDonalds, I would have applied there,” Lewis said.

So when he was 18, he applied again and this time the funeral home hired him. He said he even lived above the funeral home and did everything from polishing the floors to emptying the waste baskets to assisting the funeral director with the bodies.

He also began taking mortuary classes at Missouri Southern.

Then he moved to Dallas and began classes at the Dallas Institute of Funeral Service on South Buckner Boulevard and did much of his practical work at Sparkman-Hillcrest to earn his associates in applied science.

He met LaFleur 16 years ago. LaFleur was in retail and isn’t a funeral director. They met at JR.’s.

“We stared at each other from across the room,” Lewis said. So one day he finally walked up to LaFleur and said, “Are we going to just stare at each other across the room or are you going to ask me out?”

LaFleur gave him his email address. Lewis went right home and sent LaFleur a message and the email bounced. LaFleur insists it was an honest mistake.

They met up at JR.’s again the next week, exchanged phone numbers and made a date to see each other the following weekend. Lewis said they ate dinner, watched a movie but he left, and they didn’t see each other for another four years.

LaFleur was diagnosed with cancer and then he left for Louisiana to take care of his mother. When he returned to Dallas, they met up again on MySpace and have been together ever since.

A few years ago, Lewis, who’s a member of the Turtle Creek Chorale, was talking to another member, who is also a funeral director, about how hard it was working for a funeral home owned by a large corporation.

“I still want my own place,” he said. “I know a place in Ferris for sale,” the other member told him.

A year passed before he decided to at least check out Ferris. The funeral home was still for sale, so on a Sunday morning, he drove to Ferris just to take a look even though he knew the place wouldn’t be open.

As he was driving through town, though, he noticed signs for an open house. He decided to stop in and maybe get a feel for the town from the real estate agent.

She asked what he was looking for in a house, and he said he was actually interested in Green Funeral Home that was for sale but stopped by the open house to get some information about Ferris from someone local. The agent told him her father owned the funeral home, and she called her dad and arranged for Lewis to meet him.

Six months later, Lewis and LaFleur were in the funeral business.

Their goal, LaFleur said, is to outgrow the current building within five years. “That means we have four years left,” Lewis said.

While Ferris is growing quickly — 150 homes are already under construction on the west side of I-45, and T. Boone Pickens’ widow owns a ranch on the east side of the highway that she plans to develop — the couple knows they can’t rely on business just from the Ferris area.

So, Lewis said, anyone was welcome to come to Ferris and use their facility, and It’s never too late for estate planning... well, almost never.

As I started thinking about how I wanted to wrap up this LGBTQ+ History Month installment of my Queer Creatives series, I circled back to my original intention in creating it to begin with: I wanted a series that highlights queer artists whose art inspired change both in my/our lives and the world as a whole.

But I also wanted to answer questions I had as an artist living and creating amid many intersections. How do the beginnings of change that ultimately make up our history happen? How does someone who wants to create something even start to bring that idea to life?

The exploration into these answers was/is the driving force behind this series.

And as I was kicking off this weekly October series, I was asked by Gage Baird and Thomas Massaquoi to be on their final Humanity 101 panel of the year. Their series has covered a range of topics, from dating to entrepreneurship to the generational gap in our community. The last panel — happening on Monday, Oct. 28 — is a conversation between all the humans that LGBT represents.

It’s called “Alphabet Education” a name based on the label, The Alphabet People, that Dave Chapelle uses to refer to us in his new Netflix comedy special.

And there, while deciding to profile Humanity 101 and thinking about this series as a whole, was the answer to my first question: How do the beginnings of change that ultimately make up our history happen? History is created by those who not only wish to be a part of the change but take action towards that change.

The Humanity 101 series is an LGBTQ+-focused lecture and conversation series founded in February 2019 with its the main objective being to “facilitate dialogue among our community members.” That dialogue and the premise for the series was dreamed up by Gage Baird, lead strategic pricing analyst at McKesson Corporation and co-chair of their LGBTQ+ employee group, OPEN, and Thomas Massaquoi, a self-sustaining artist, writer, activist and community outreach coordinator. They came up with it over brunch.

“Thomas began talking about this idea he had been pondering on for quite some time. He mentioned that he had seen the idea done before in other large metropolitan areas [and] after some further discussion, we determined that Dallas didn’t have something like what we were proposing,” Gage explained.

So they set out to do it.

Which answers my second question: How does someone who wants to create something even start to bring that idea to life? You just start, despite perhaps not knowing where it’s going to go or where it’s going to end up. You take a leap of activist faith, and you just do it.

The part where most of us who have a great idea get lost or lose our steam is in the details and logistics. Gage mentioned that it took them “nearly 10 months to lay it all out,” choosing “what topics we wanted to discuss, how we would organize the flow of the segments, the timeline and the types of panelists we wanted for our series.”

But on Feb. 25 they hosted their first event, “Why Are You Still Single? A talk on relationships and online dating.” In addition to understanding how they began, I was deeply curious about their name choice, Humanity 101, as opposed to LGBTQ 101 or anything else that was more queer-specific. “Humanity 101 just seemed fitting, since our sole purpose is to provide an educational platform where people can learn and discuss important topics, bettering humanity in its Speaker of the House Dennis Bonnen was fresh off a successful legislative session when he met with the far-right conservative activist Michael Quinn Sullivan last June. Bonnen had shepherded through a school finance reform bill increasing state funding for public education and a controversial law stopping municipalities from raising property taxes by more than 3 percent without voter approval.

Social issues like abortion and lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender rights were largely avoided in the House under his reign.

LGBT advocates were relieved by that after previous sessions when they had to fight off numerous bills seeking to restrict bathroom access for transgender people and were unable to stop lawmakers from passing a law allowing adoption agencies to decline services based on religious beliefs.

Observers credited Bonnen for his hands-on approach during the 140-day session, which began in January and ended in May. And the victories were seen as a way for Republicans who narrowly won re-election in 2018 to go home and tout their successes among swing voters.

Rebecca Marques, Texas state director for the Human Rights Campaign, cited Republican progress on LGBT issues this past session:

“This session brought several significant milestones when it comes to Republican support for LGBT rights. State Rep. Sarah Davis has long been a strong and consistent champion for LGBT equality. This session, she became the only Republican to co-sponsor a bill introduced to protect LGBT youth from the dangerous practice of so-called ‘conversion therapy,’” Marques said.

Even in the very conservative Republican-led Senate, “Sen. Kel Seliger (R-Amarillo) became the first Republican in the Senate to vote in defense of the LGBTQ Texans. These are two great examples of Republicans doing the right thing,” Marques added, “and we hope more will join them in the effort to make Texas a welcoming place for our community.”

But on Tuesday, Oct. 22, after several House members, including some of his committee chairmen, called for his resignation, Bonnen announced his retirement after two decades in the Legislature.
group is funded by evangelical Christian and school voucher advocate Tim Dunn of Midland and collaborates with Texas Values and the Eagle Forum, all of whom oppose LGBT rights.

The organization regularly attacks Republican lawmakers who break with hard right priorities. During the era of Republican lawmakers who break with LGBT rights. Values and the Eagle Forum, all of whom of Midland and collaborates with Texas and school voucher advocate Tim Dunn group is funded by evangelical Christian people who want to do things.

Bonnen and Burrows wanted a frank, off the record meeting about his organization’s tactics. In exchange for not targeting vulnerable Republicans in the primaries, the group could go after 10 Republicans, including some who ran against Bonnen for speaker, in the primaries. Burrows, who resigned as caucus chairman after portions of the tape were released, included the 10 lawmakers because they voted against a bill banning so-called taxpayer funded lobbying.

But Sullivan released a tape and transcript of what was said in that meeting earlier this month, and when he did, the chorus of outrage grew. The tape and transcript showed Bonnen not only slandering members of his own party and saying he hates cities and counties, they also document how he went after Democrats, too.

On the tape, Bonnen described freshman Rep. Jon Rosenthal of Houston as “mak[ing] his skin crawl.” Then he added, referring to his chief of staff Gavin Massingill: “Massingill said it best — ‘Well, his wife’s gonna be really pissed when she learns he’s gay.’”

Bonnen also described Rep. Michelle Beckley, the Carrollton Democrat who defeated former Rep. and anti-transgender bathroom bill author Ron Simmons, as “vile.”

The comments about Beckley and Rosenthal, both members of the House LGBTQ Caucus, flew in the face of Bonnen’s decision to steer clear of social issues as well as his promise to go after any member who goes after another.

The House Democratic Caucus praised his decision not to seek re-election.

Caucus Chair Chris Turner of Grand Prairie, First Vice-Chair Celia Israel of Austin, Second Vice-Chair Toni Rose of Dallas and Treasurer Oscar Longoria of Mission issued a statement saying, “Speaker Bonnen has made the right decision, as it has become increasingly clear that he no longer has the support to serve as speaker again. Democratic Members of the House will continue our work to lead Texas to a better tomorrow by focusing on strong public schools, affordable health care and stopping gun violence.”

What happens in 2021?

But now that Bonnen is gone, what’s going to happen around LGBT issues in the 2021 Texas legislative session? Marques said it should be business as usual.

“Regardless of this scandal, the fundamental political dynamics haven’t changed for LGBTQ Texans,” she said. “After the 2018 election, it is clear that Texans want to elect and be represented by pro-equality candidates. And it’s...”

they can handle a funeral anywhere. Not that Ferris is that far from the Metroplex — from downtown Dallas, it’s about the same distance as Plano. It’s just over the Ellis County line, four miles south of the Belt Line Road exit.

Green Funeral Home can handle embalming, whether the family is using his facility or not. He can deliver the casket to any church for a funeral service, and if the family chooses cremation, Lewis said he can do that, too.

Lewis said they’ve driven as far as Houston to pick up a body, so they can certainly perform a funeral anywhere in the Dallas area.

While the current Green Funeral Home building is a few blocks from the town square and can hold about 120 for a service, Lewis said they also hold services in area churches all the time.

The Rev. Neil Thomas, senior pastor at Cathedral of Hope, said he was glad to have the services of a gay funeral director available in the area.

“I think in this era of religious liberties, we find people are being turned away from all sorts of services,” Thomas said.

“When you’re at that place of deepest need, we don’t need to overcome needless hurdles at a time of loss.”

Thomas said he feels we’re returning to an era when, just as during the AIDS crisis, LGBT people are even being turned away from funeral homes. So it’s good to have a funeral director who is openly gay to handle our final needs, he said.

It’s also comforting to have two people who do their jobs well working with you at the hardest time of your life.

entirely,” Gage told me. And Thomas added, “Because we are all human at the core, and we’re bound to [have] similar feelings.”

And isn’t that — finding ways to connect (NOT assimilate) in the spirit of solidarity in a way that honors (NOT erases) the individual in their complex personhood and experiences — the roots of art, creativity, change? Of connection itself?

Which answers my final question: How do everyday people like us go from the place they are to making real, long-lasting, impactful change? The answer: We start from where we are.

Change is made when the personal — what is happening in our daily lives, in the community around us — becomes political. But it only becomes political, social change if we make it so.

When I asked Gage & Thomas about their plans for the future of their series, they let me know they “have big ones” — like “grow our platform,” “a podcast,” “branch out to schools and universities,” “create a Humanity 101 Youth version.”

“Right now it’s grassroots style; we want this to build organically,” Thomas said.

And isn’t that how all great movements begin? How long-lasting, impactful change happens? With the people? From the people? From the self?

Dear Candy,

The holiday season can be tough for my partner and me. He doesn’t have a good relationship with his family, and he gets very anxious when he’s surrounded by my hectic family. Is there anything I can do to maybe help him enjoy quality time with my family, or would it do more harm than good?

— Wanting to Help

Dear Wanting,

First, it’s good you are aware of the family dynamics of your partner. Plus, you’re sensitive to his anxiety around your family during the holidays. Second, it’s never a harmful thing to do to communicate with your partner — when it’s done in a respectful, sane way.

I’m sure you’re curious about what is going on with your partner around your family. Ask him to tell you how it is to be with your family during the holidays.

You mentioned hectic. Let’s see what he says about them. If he says yes, see if that’s something you’re willing to do. If not, let him know that, too.

Sometimes, just having you listen to him may be enough to help him through another holiday. You might also ask him what he himself can do to help himself manage his emotions during these holiday visits.

The goal here is for both of you to celebrate the holidays together and with family in an enjoyable way. I’m sure you two can make this happen.

Good Luck,
Candy

Dear Losing,

Transitioning itself comes with many twists and turns. Transitioning is not done in a vacuum. As you’ve alluded, there are other people who are also impacted by these twists and turns.

This is an excellent time to take your marriage to a licensed marriage and family counselor, and work these twists and turns out with a professional.

Your marriage is about two people. You both need to present to a counselor how the conversations go in your marriage. The marriage counselor will not tell you what you should do but will help you two have a better conversation. You will learn to say what you want to say, so your spouse can hear you, and vice versa.

This is not a one conversation and done. The journey is about learning the skills to better communicate. You and your wife will figure out how your relationship will look going forward.

Good luck,
Candy

Dear Candy

I am a trans male working on my marriage to my wife of nine years. I began my transition in 2015 and, at first, it was kind of a shock but it seemed ok. Now, almost five years later, we are fighting to keep our marriage together. It seems like the only thing holding us together are our two kids. I don’t want to lose hope, but I don’t want to keep her miserable.

Like Marques, Mary Gonzalez noted many pro-LGBT bills were heard in committee for the first time this year. “We got hearings on the conversion therapy ban for teenagers 18 and younger,” she said, referring to a bill filed by Israel, who is lesbian. Another bill adding hate crimes protections for transgender individuals, introduced by County Affairs Committee Chairman Garnet Coleman, D-Houston, was also heard, although neither passed out of committee.

Still, Mary Gonzalez said, “I’m glad we got the ball moving forward.”

And while the goal next session should be getting that ball across the finish line, the Senate remains a barrier to progress, the El Paso lawmaker noted.

While Democrats picked up two seats in the upper chamber in 2018, the Republican caucus is far more conservative there, thanks to the efforts of groups like Empower Texans. Democrats predict they will only pick up one seat — a sprawling district stretching from West Texas and into San Antonio that is currently held by Sen. Pete Flores of Pleasanton. Flores became the first Republican to hold the seat since its inception after winning a summer special election.

With Bonnen gone, Democrats are also now aggressively recruiting candidates to oppose those Republicans they see as vulnerable. For the first time in two decades, Democrats are close to seizing control of the lower chamber; they need to claim nine seats.

Sam Robles, advocacy director of Progress Texas, which supports LGBT rights, thinks a Democratic-controlled House is possible.

“The Republican Party is losing their grip on political power with the rise of young people, women of color, and people of color taking back Texas,” she said. And if that happens, Bonnen’s absence won’t mean nearly as much on LGBT issues.

Coming out about HIV

“Josh Robbins Comes Out.” That was the headline on the April 2012 cover story of Nashville’s LGBT monthly publication, O&AN, detailing my announcement in my community that I was newly diagnosed with HIV.

During the photoshoot for the cover story, I remember explaining to the photographer and editor of the publication how important it was to me that I looked healthy, strong and sexy. I didn’t want to look too pale, too thin — I didn’t want to look sick.

It was important to me to look as normal as possible, so I wouldn’t look like the stereotypes. It’s funny how much image plays into how the public sees a chronic condition like HIV.

As I sit and look at the 20 extra copies of that magazine that I kept for some unknown reason, I can’t help but wonder what if it wasn’t as newsworthy as it is currently when a public figure or celebrity announces they are living with HIV? But there always has been a big media frenzy when someone known discloses publicly.

The first time that I remember talking about HIV in my life was when a celebrity decided to come out with their diagnosis. It was Magic Johnson in 1991. I remember hearing adults around me discussing everything from how scared they were of the virus to how much Johnson deserved it since he slept around on his wife with so many women to people saying he had money so he would live. I remember some people calling him gay, and it was then I heard my first jokes about AIDS.

I was 8 years old. I lived in Jackson, Tenn., and I watched the news about Magic Johnson along with the rest of the world. It was not the terrible news that blood-stained my innocence to HIV/AIDS as a child; it was the adults’ reactions to his honesty that made me begin to fear people living with HIV.

I don’t think I understood much more then than that Magic was going to die. But yet, he didn’t. He hasn’t. And now 28 years after he became the face of HIV, the reality is that when he does pass away, it will probably have very little, if anything, to do with HIV.

That’s an important victory in the journey of those living with HIV and AIDS — that the face of the virus is a long-term survivor.

But Magic became much more than the face of HIV. He became the example of how to live with HIV. And for that, the rest of us living with HIV have an example of one way to choose to take this journey — to face it and try to become a better person.

As I reminisce about my own journey, I recognize that Magic Johnson really is a hero of mine and someone that became more important to me as I age. In previous interviews, I have often joked that the only things I knew about HIV before I was diagnosed came from the film Philadelphia and basketball star Magic Johnson. Although I still don’t identify with the film personally, I am starting to understand the impact of what Johnson did to elevate awareness of the epidemic at the time — and still to this day.

Magic Johnson coming out about his medical diagnosis created more than just a news memory for me as a child. I think watching him bravely face the world to announce something so personal helped prepare me for my own moment of sharing on social media that I was diagnosed with HIV in 2012.

Every time a celebrity, a public figure or someone we know more personally chooses to announce they are living with HIV, it helps to educate the public about the real day-to-day journey of those living with this condition. Education also helps to curb stigma against us.

Gareth Thomas’ recent announcement (See it at WaxOh.com) is a sad example of how extreme stigma affects celebrities, sometimes forcing them to make an announcement and coming out before being forcibly outing.

Recently when Jonathan Van Ness went public about living with HIV (see also at WaxOh.com), it provided a mass media exposure and opportunity to educate about U=U (Undetectable equals Untransmittable).

Although I wish someone announcing they are living with HIV wasn’t as newsworthy as it is, I’m certainly respecting the big choice that they are making. And I’m thankful that they continue to pave the future of eliminating stigma around living with HIV.

Unicorn magic

Singer, Oklahoman, Christian, gay icon: The many faces of Kristin Chenoweth

Kristin Chenoweth likes to say that if it can’t be explained, it must be the unicorns. So how does she explain her many gay fans? Well, you’re only partially right if you thought it was because she originated the role of a beguiling, bedazzled, not-wicked witch who belts in a cloud of bubbles while flailing a wand. Because it’s also, obviously, a “unicorn thing.”

And why, exactly, did our call abruptly drop mid conversation? Was the Broadway star in a deep canyon? Was it AT&T? An overloaded cell tower? A weak signal? “You know what,” she squeaks when we reconnect, “it’s unicorn problems!”

Chenoweth’s perpetually chirpy way of life is a mood that can also best be explained as being … well, it’s unicornian, of course. It just is, and we’re all better for it. Ahead of her appearance in Mansfield this weekend and the release of her latest album, For the Girls, we caught up with the 51-year-old Broadway legend and gay cruiser to talk about not stalking Dolly Parton, new details on the Death Becomes Her musical she’s set to star in and why she thinks it’s important to perform on Mike Huckabee’s show … especially in a rainbow dress.

— Chris Azzopardi

Dallas Voice: Before we get to the album, I have to know: What was your favorite part of sailing on a cruise ship in August with so many gay men? Kristin Chenoweth: [Laughs] It’s my version of heaven!

I haven’t even gone on a gay cruise, and I think it’s my version of heaven, too.

So you’d recommend I go? Yes! You know what it should be called? Love Cruise, because everybody is just there to have fun. I just loved it. I wanted to actually go on the thing, but it’s kind of hard for me [laughs] to be on a cruise because it’s pretty widely known I have Ménière’s Disease, an inner ear vertigo thing. So it’s hard for me to be on a boat … for very long, anyway. So it always bums me out when I have to disembark. I’m like, “Man, I wanna be on this thing!” But you should go!

You performed “For Good” with Katharine McPhee on the cruise. The video of it went viral. Where does that rank among the gayest moments in a career filled with them? I know, right? It was awesome. I’ve always been so moved when we’ve done it, because her heart is so big, and that’s who needs to sing that song — somebody with a heart, really big and open. Never mind that voice. The voice is ridiculous, it’s just wonderful. But I always look for the heart, too. She’s got it in spades. And it was just a pleasure for us to do, and it was also a pleasure for it to be received so well.

Whose idea was it to put you in a super cute Michael Kors rainbow dress? Well, whose do you think? [laughs] It was mine! I called my publicist. I said, “Do you think Michael would make the dress?” Because it’s so perfect. And he was kind enough to just gift me that dress. It’s so funny: I’m gonna have to do Huckabee [former Arkansas governor and conservative commentator Mike Huckabee’s weekly talk show] and Michael’s like, “You’re not gonna do Huckabee.” I’m like, “I sure am! I’m gonna wear my rainbow dress. You know I’m gonna wear my Pride flag. You bet I am! Of course I am!” It’s important for us to not only wear it with our people but with our not people.

Why is that true for you? Because if we don’t talk to each other, and if we don’t talk to people who disagree with us or don’t believe like us, then we will never move forward.

Shifting to your new album, I know this is called For the Girls, but Babs, Judy, Dinah and Doris… some of these songs strike me as ones that maybe you listened to with gay friends growing up. You think? How did you guess? Of course! You know, I had such a blessing in high school: I did have a group of friends — some were in the closet, and some weren’t — and I feel like we did sit around, and obviously we listened to Judy and we listened to Barbra, but I think I would’ve done that anyway, because my parents, even though they’re engineers, loved music. They would listen to everything — I mean from Puccini, everything that was on PBS. And I introduced them to Madonna, which was shocking at first. But we kind of loved everything in our house, and I think that says a lot about the way I was raised and also just what my musical tastes are. I wouldn’t say...
I’ve mastered them all, but country music was a big part of me. I’ve wanted to do that Dolly song (“I Will Always Love You,” which is featured on For the Girls) since I can remember, with her, and I never thought she’d say yes and, man, she did. I can’t believe she did.

But of course I’m gonna honor Judy on that record; of course I’m gonna honor Barbra. People forget about Eydie Gormé’s “I Wanna Be Around;” I’m gonna sing Eydie Gormé. I’m going to honor Linda [Ronstadt], who was one of the most versatile singers we had. I was on the cheerleading squad, and I remember we had to make up a routine for halftime, and mine was a lyrical dance to Linda’s “Desperado.” I remember the cheerleaders going, “I don’t think so. I don’t think that’s gonna work out.” That tells you where my brain and heart always were.

With the gay icons, of course. Yeah, right.

How would you describe this album to a straight man? My producer, Steve Tyrell, is as straight as they come, and he and I both wanted to honor the women. But I said to him in a recording session, “You know, this isn’t just about the women, this isn’t just about the renaissance that we are having now.” My tribute to them is about the men who’ve loved them. Gay, straight, tall, short. It’s really about the men who’ve been behind the women, like my dad. And so I think that’s kind of where it’s “for the girls,” for sure, but I hope the men who love us love it, too.

Which, of course, includes gay men. I know you know there’s a special bond between gay men and straight women. There is. I’ve been asked to explain that, and I say that’s a unicorn thing. I don’t know. It’s just how it is. It started for me when I was a little girl; I’ve always just been drawn to that community. Especially when I went to college, my world was opened up even more by some of my best friends, especially growing up in the Bible Belt and how interesting that’s been, as well. But I say that it goes together for me, my faith and my love for not just gays but people. Listen, if you’re a jerk, I’m probably not gonna like ya.

And listen, there are gay jerks. Just like there are straight jerks, so I get it, baby. I get it.

You are meticulous in your approach to the roles you play on TV, in film and on Broadway. Like for your part on NBC’s Trial & Error, you knew the slap gloves had to be leather, and you knew why, and you were very specific. How does your creative brain work when you’re taking on a song that’s been done to death, like “Crazy” or “When I Fall In Love?” Yeah, thank you for saying that. I absolutely am. And I know that sometimes it makes other people bananas, but I have to say what I know, and one thing I’ve learned — and this is just what you call evolution in life — is if you do your truth, and you have a reason for it, they might not all agree or like it, but they can’t get mad at you for it. I’m gonna say what I think because a) I’ve been doing it for a second, and b) I’ve been trained, and c) I care! If I didn’t care I’d say, “OK, I’m just gonna release a record, who cares.” I wouldn’t have a thought about it. I wouldn’t.

When we were recording “I’m a Woman” with Jennifer [Hudson] and Reba [McEntire], I said, “I have to have Aretha on this album, I don’t know how to do that.” Steve Tyrell was like, “We’re gonna have her speak at the end.” Blew my mind. And that’s why I want to work with Steve, and that’s why I went to work with the people that I worked with on Trial & Error, because they think like me; I think like them. It’s kind of a unique club, and I’m not saying that we’re more precious or more special than others; I’m saying that being meticulous about your art is a gift. The day that I don’t care is the day I’ll quit.

How has “You Don’t Own Me,” which you’ve recorded as a duet with Ariana Grande, influenced you? I remember the first time I heard it: I heard Lesley Gore’s version, because in my family we listened to Lesley Gore. Then I became a big fan of Dusty Springfield’s and over the years have kind of compared the two, and I always, for me, love the original. I always go back to the original. It’s just kind of who I am. Which is interesting that I chose to do this record, because I’m trying to put my stamp on original songs.

But I went back to Lesley’s version, and I wanted Ariana because I feel like it’s kind of my version of old school and new school together. I just felt like the words and lyrics were us.

You’ve spoken a lot about Dolly over the years and her influence on your career. Now that you’ve recorded a song with her, how chummy are you and Dolly? Do you text each other? Well, mainly what I do is video because these nails don’t really do well with texting. [Laughs] And if I could just quit and go on tour with her, I would do it. I would do it! It’s not stalker-y, but it is a healthy obsession, and it started, again, when I was little, and I thought, “I feel like her.” That was the feeling I got. Then a long time ago, when we first met she was like, “You’re like me!” And I was like, “I know!” It’s been like that over the years. And do I wish I could see her more? Yeah. Do I wish I could be with her on the bus watching her cook? Yes.

Hey, I bet you never thought that you would record a song with her, so you never know. I never did. My next dream: I wanna go to Dollywood real bad. That’s exactly what I’ll do.

And you’ll FaceTime her when you’re riding the rides? That’s exactly what I’ll do.

Daisies musical or potential TV revival?

I think Lee Pace and series creator Bryan Fuller have been maybe trying to cook up something. Well, I wish they’d hurry up, because we didn’t really get closure, which was, if you want to look at it this way, also a beautiful thing. But Bryan keeps talking about it, and I know nothing would make me happier. I just felt like we got the slow “no.” Networks and studios, I get it, it’s a business. It’s nothing against them. It’s just that we didn’t know that when we filmed our season finale that it was our series finale. I think we’ve all been kind of searching for [a revival] since.

Do you have a preference as to whether the show should return as a musical or TV revival? Gosh, you know, I think it would be lovely to have a TV revival, because it was so unique looking on camera. It was beautiful. And the music ended up being … well, anything Bryan does, music is a big part of it, whether there’s singing or not. I just would hate not to have that look again on film.

I feel like as a gay man I already know the answer to this, but what sold you on a musical version of Death Becomes Her?

Everything. At first, when they approached me, I thought it was obviously for the Goldie Hawn part. And they said, “No. The Meryl Streep part.” And I was like, “Really?” Cause I love her, I love that role. I just knew I wanted to do it. I knew the story was funny. I know that it is going to be unique in the trickery that they are inventing. And I know it’s funny. That doesn’t always mean that the show will be funny, but I know the writer, and I have read part of it — we have part of the show — and I have complete confidence in what we’re going to create, and I can’t wait to show the world.

I can’t wait to see how they’re going to make your head turn. I have a bad neck, so I’m like, “Good luck with that, people.” [Laughs] But I think they’ve been talking with different kinds of illusionists and magicians, and I think it might be kind of a …. not kind of, I think it will be the first on Broadway of its kind, and I just can’t wait. I cannot wait.

RuPaul gave you his blessing to play Christian singer and evangelist Tammy Faye Baker. Is Ru the ultimate seal of approval?

Yes! I’ve been waiting. I mean, I’m sitting here doing a time step. I’m waiting for the script. We just hired Robert Horn who just had great success with Tootsie on Broadway and David Yazbek, so you know, tick-tock, tick-tock. I’m waiting. I can’t wait to get the lashes going, but also, I just can’t wait to explore her spirit, which was very deep. A lot deeper than people understood. I don’t see it as a big Broadway musical, per se. I don’t think that’s what we’re looking at. I think it’s much more of a small – you know how Audra [McDonald] did Lady Day?

More in that vein.

You didn’t exactly plan to become the belle of Broadway, and I’ve read that you even thought you’d just become a singer, but obviously your career took you in different directions. What is the most pleasantly unexpected detour your career has taken up to this point? Aww, what a great question. Seriously. I guess when I think about the work I’ve done, I would say having the opportunity to do all kinds of music. I didn’t think I’d have the opportunity to do a country record. I didn’t think I’d have an opportunity to make an inspirational Christian record. I didn’t think I’d get the opportunity to put my stamp on Gershwin and Cole Porter last time. I didn’t know that I’d get to do a live record with film at a theater. And now this one. My label has given me great opportunities to do all of the kinds of music I like, and that was a big surprise to me because so many times labels get a bad rap, like, “I’m gonna be handcuffed to doing just one thing.” I have been able and allowed to do several things; that’s been a big surprise.

The personal thing that’s been a surprise with my career has been getting to talk about my faith and my beliefs behind that, and my love for our community that we’re talking about right now. I didn’t know that that was going to become so important, shall I say. I didn’t know, much like Tammy Faye was a trailblazer, that I was going to be … I just always was who I was. I have lost fans because of it; I have gained fans because of it. But the most important part of that for me, personally, is knowing in my heart that one of my purposes in life is being fulfilled: getting to say what I think and what I believe.
Wake in fright

Tales of true terror and the supernatural, told by those who lived them

ARNOLD WAYNE JONES | Executive Editor
jones@dallasvoice.com

Milestones in the gay community have always been perversely tied to death. Gay Pride Month (June) was selected because that’s when the Stonewall Riots began, themselves occasioned by the death of Judy Garland (as well as violence against queer people). October became Gay History Month in part because of the murder of Matthew Shepard. The fact this is also the month of Halloween, a holiday the LGBTQ community has embraced as “Gay Christmas,” only reinforces our association with the macabre.

As perverse as it may be, it’s not surprising. Gay people have long been objects of violence, derision, scare tactics. Local raconteur Rawlins Gilliland even created a one-man show, titled Happy Murder Stories, about actual incidents of horror he has encountered during his travels. (Among them: A homicidal truck driver, and a family of rednecks literally hunting him for sport.)

“A scary story can be a close call with violence or prolonged suspenseful tension with physical or even mental danger imminent,” explains Gilliland of his definition. “These sagas tend to be graded on a curve. Some of us conflate being on a ship that loses power [and] food becoming scarce as terrifying, while someone like me has enough horror stories to fill a one-man show.”

solo performances, about how he stumbled upon a rape/murder in 1965, is as scary now as when he was hiking alone late at night, lost on the vertical trails within Maui’s massive dormant volcano, Haleakula in 1999. “Being murdered by strangers or plunging from a cliff in the dense midnight fog have the same result — I would never have lived to tell the story,” he says. “That is why I enjoyed the Murders show the most: Because I had lived to tell the stories... and had come to enjoy that I had survived scary stories instead of being captured by my own fears in their aftermath. ‘I’ll never get over it’ has never been my mantra.”

So to commemorate Halloween week — and soon after many locals have their own frightening tornado tales — we asked a few other North Texas folks (queer and not) to share some of their personal stories of fright, from unexplained brushes with the supernatural to scary experiences fully standing in the real world. Each of these stories, they insist, are true.

The most recent thing happened to us about five months ago. We were at an intersection at night, in the right lane waiting to turn right. Our light was red, and opposing traffic had a green arrow, so we were letting them pass. However, my car suddenly started moving and turned right — like the wheel was turning, and as we were accelerating though I kept trying to apply the brakes. You could hear the engine groan and everything. Jason screamed, “Stop! What are you doing!?” No sooner had he finished that sentence when we hear a terrible crash. Right behind us is a car flying into the intersection, spinning a couple times and crashing. It was completely totaled. When we drove back that way after dinner, we saw three ambulances and what seemed like a very bad situation. We really felt an angel was looking out for us.

— John Shore

I’ve got two stories. First, when I was 16, I went with a friend’s family to Vicksburg, Miss., to visit the Civil War battlefield. Afterward, we went to the old courthouse, which is now a museum. As you go upstairs, there’s a large room of various Civil War artifacts, one of them a brown velvet hoop skirt dress. As soon as I saw it, I reacted instinctively, thinking: “Aww, there’s my dress. I wonder why they don’t have the matching shoes and mother’s coral necklace?”... Uh, say what now?
Second, one time we went with my mom to look at a foreclosed house in Frisco — just a house built in the '90s, but in bad shape, with a crack running through the foundation. It was summer, with no a/c running, yet it felt icy inside. There was something about it that put us all on edge — none of us would even consider going upstairs. The upstairs was just radiating dark vibes. We got out fast, and all agreed that we kept expecting to find blood stains on the carpet in the bedroom or something.

When we got home, I googled the address. The son who lived upstairs had murdered his mother while she slept. But there weren’t any stains on the carpet … because all the blood was in the mattress.

— Jessica Layman

Two stories of living in Tribeca in 1979:

Wholly by accident, I moved into an apartment [occupied by] organizers of a Rocky Horror convention. David, one of the three people who put on the convention, said, “Come with me to pay these guys.” I didn’t know who he meant, but I had a pretty crazy life and agreed. We go into the club, and someone grabs David by the arm and escorts him back to the office. In there was this Mafia kid — the son of some [mobster] who I didn’t even want to know. They had these Dobermans, which were scary. That’s when I saw the guy who had him by the arm also had a gun to his ribs. David had several thousand dollars in cash in his jacket, but only had half the money they were owed. The [Mafia kid] looked at me and said, “Who’s the dame? What are you doing here?” I thought, “Wow, this really is like a movie … only I could really die.” I said, “I’m from Texas.” They seemed puzzled. The guns, the dogs, the money, these goons — this wasn’t like buying pot in high school. I realized these people could make us disappear, and nobody would ever find us. They finally let us go. Initially I was like “ha-ha, that was an adventure,” until the next morning. That’s when I asked David, “Why did you take me?” He said, “You were my protection!” And I sensed he was right. I was this weird talisman — who knew who I really was? I was 20 and thought I knew everything and was from Texas. They didn’t know what to make of me.

Another time, I was walking to work when this man comes up and asks me a question. [He didn’t like my answer], and grabs me by the throat and crotch and throws me to the ground. I started yelling at him, and he ran off. When I got to work, I saw there were bloody handprints on my neck. We called the cops, and it turned out the man had beaten and raped a girl three blocks south a few minutes before he saw me.

And then there was when Trump got elected....

Heyyyyy yooooooooo guuuuuuysss!!!! It’s freakin’ October and it finally feels like fall. It makes me so flippin’ happy to go outside and not burst into flames. Plus it is getting closer to Halloween, the time when we heathens can charge our evil souls to get us through the holiday season without bloodshed. I just love sweata weatha.

My husband Jamie and I recently went on a much needed vacation to Key West. It was fabulous. Once our plane left DFW, I unplugged and did not even message any of my work peeps or showgirls. It stresses me to think about it but I know the world does not end if I’m not there to manage it. I refuse to be a micromanager and my fabulous sisters proved I had nothing to worry about. The show will always go on, with or without you. I both love and hate that.

Anyhoo… Key West had some great restaurants and some fun bars to drink at, but they still let people smoke indoors. I guess it’s not a big deal there since everywhere has a patio or an open setup but I hated that. We are so spoiled here.

We did a couple of excursions on the water that were awesome. Our first one took us and 10 other people out snorkeling, kayaking and paddle boarding. I was a little disappointed in the snorkeling — we saw some beautiful fish and some big ass spiny lobsters but seeing so much dead coral broke my heart. It was still really cool. Snorkeling is one of my all-time favorite activities.

The kayaking was fun but taught me I have zero core strength. Thank god for the two-person kayak and my strong husband. Our tour guide took us in and around these cool mangrove trees that looked like they popped out of nowhere — just a bunch of mangrove trees out in the middle of the ocean.

Our tour guides/boat crew did a great job educating us on the importance of the mangrove trees and how much they help the ecosystem. My nerd side loved all that.

The next day, we went to Dry Tortugas National Park. It is a Civil War fort out in the middle of nowhere. We had to take a ferry for two-and-a-half hours to get there but it was worth it. The fort takes up the entire island that it sits on. It is huge and even has its own moat. We snorkeled around it and hiked all over the place, inside and out. The ferry brought about 200 people, but the place is so spread out that we didn’t have to be around anybody if we didn’t want to. We were there about four hours before we head- ing back, exhausted. It was crazy-beautiful but the ride back was rough. Huge waves and too many kids running around made the two-and-a-half hours back feel like days. I’m still glad we did it. On the plus side, I only made one kid cry.

One of the things that surprised me about Key West: There are no great beaches. Yes, they have a few beaches, but there wasn’t enough sand. By the time the water reaches your knees and thighs, it becomes really rocky and hard to maneuver. Plus the kinda fatty smell of the sargassum grossed me out. Sargassum is not just a problem in Key West, it is everywhere along the east coast and down into South America. It’s seaweed that washes up on shore, and as it decays it releases hydrogen sulfide gas. Most of the hotels and resorts do a great job of cleaning it up, but every once in a while you would get the whiff of farts on the sea air.

Y’all know how much I love sea turtles, but unfortunately we didn’t see any while we were snorkeling. We did see a bunch of sea turtles out in the middle of the ocean.

Y’all know how much I love sea turtles, but unfortunately we didn’t see any while we were snorkeling. We did see a bunch at the Turtle Hospital in Marathon, Fla. We did a tour of the facility and saw all of the great work they do to treat and rehabilitate sick or injured turtles. We got to see some little-bitty babies, and I about died. Totes adorable!

Overall, Key West was a blast. I can’t wait for our next adventure — possibly Dublin, Ireland? Who knows? Happy Halloween er’body!

Remember to always love more, bitch less and be fabulous! XOXO Cassie Nova
