TCC names Jeremy Wayne
executive director

The Turtle Creek Chorale’s Board of Directors has voted to appoint Jeremy Wayne as executive director of the organization. Wayne joined the Chorale staff in May 2017 as director of operations and was promoted to managing director a year ago, assuming executive director duties at that time.

In the last year, Wayne, who joined Turtle Creek Chorale in the fall of 2016 as a singing member, has been instrumental in helping strengthen the organization’s finances, board officials said, introducing a new director of development with whom he has worked to create a new development plan. That plan includes Rhapsody, the chorale’s upcoming 40th Anniversary Benefit Gala, featuring Idina Menzel. Wayne also created the position of director of patron experience, which will focus on strengthening relationships with the Chorale’s patrons.

Equality Texas celebrates 30 years, hands out awards

Equality Texas recently celebrated its 30th anniversary, spending Saturday evening, Nov. 6.

Equality Texas’ history begins in 1978 when lesbian and gay activists recognized the need to be active at the Texas Capitol. In 1989, they incorporated into the Lesbian/Gay Rights Lobby of Texas, which changed its name to Equality Texas in 2006.

Acting CEO Angela Hale and veteran journalist Harvey Kronburg emceed the gala, which included the presentation of several awards:

- State Sen. José Rodríguez and state Rep. Senfronia Thompson received the Legacy Award.
- Texas House LGBTQ Caucus co-founders state Reps. Jessica González, Mary González, Celia Israel, Julie Johnson and Erin Zwiener received the Leadership Award.
- State Rep. Sarah Davis received the Profile In Courage Award.
- Monica Roberts received the Transgender Activist Award.
- Kimberly and Kai Shappley received the Glen Maxey Activism Award.
- Apple received the Business Champion Award.
- Gearbox Software received the Business Leadership Award.
- VisitDallas and Texas Welcomes All former CEO Phillip Jones received the Business Association Champion Award.

In a reversal of decades of progress in the fight against HIV/AIDS, millennials and members of Generation Z are more likely to report risky sexual behaviors and low knowledge of the virus, according to a survey released Monday, Nov. 25.

The survey also noted that HIV diagnoses for people ages 25 to 29 have increased from 2012 to 2016, meaning that young people account for a majority of new diagnoses.

The survey, Owning HIV: Young Adults and the Fight Ahead, asked a diverse set of 1,596 millennials ages 23 to 36 and members of Generation Z (age 18 to 22) online over the summer about their attitudes and perceptions of HIV.

Merck, a global biopharmaceutical company, sponsored the survey in partnership with Prevention Access Campaign, a health equity initiative that fights HIV and HIV-related stigma.

The survey found that HIV stigma remains a barrier for getting positive individuals the care they need. Of the HIV-negative millennials who participated, 28 percent said they have avoided hugging, talking to or being friends with someone with HIV, and 30 percent prefer not to interact at all with someone with HIV.

For 36-year-old Josh Robbins, an HIV-positive activist, the stigma is overwhelming.

“It’s sometimes even worse than even the medical problems or issues that may arise,” Robbins said. “Having somebody that looks me up and down and just says that they’re not wanting to be friends with me or want to avoid anybody that’s living with HIV and doesn’t even want a hug — it is heartbreaking that in 2019 we still have these attitudes and perceptions about HIV.”

Robbins found out he was positive in 2012 at age 29. He recorded himself visiting the doctor and receiving the diagnosis then posted the video on YouTube, where it now has almost 150,000 views. He admitted that he feared HIV-positive individuals before he learned his status.

“I was terrified of people that were positive, and I’m embarrassed and ashamed of it,” he recalled. “[On dating apps], if somebody was honest, and they told me what their status was, and it was positive, I blocked them.”

More than 70 percent of HIV-negative young adults are more concerned about HIV than other sexually transmitted infections, according to the survey. Yet 54 percent have not used condoms or pre-exposure prophylaxis (PrEP), a system of drugs that prevent HIV infection that has been shown to be effective at reducing the risk of infection, according to the Centers for Disease Control.

Among HIV-positive respondents, 75 percent of millennials and 60 percent of Gen Z have contracted HIV through sex without using condoms or PrEP, the survey noted.

Robbins said he can recall how he was exposed to the virus. “People talk about risky behaviors, and that language never really spoke to me,” he said. “If I believed that something was risky, I don’t know that I would have done it. For me, I know the exact moment that exposure happened. Some people know that, and some people don’t.”

Many young adults are unaware that having an undetectable viral load poses no risk of transmitting the virus sexually, the survey also found. Only 31 percent of HIV-positive respondents in the survey knew that being undetectable meant there was no risk of transmitting the virus sexually. And almost 50 percent of HIV-negative respondents believed the virus could be transmitted even if the person was undetectable.

Particularly troubling for Robbins was the finding that 33 percent of HIV-positive Gen Zers and 38 percent of positive millennials said they forgot to take their medication for three or more days in a row, and also that more than 30 percent of diagnosed respondents believed they could stop treatment if they felt better.

“Taking our medicine is the way that we stay alive or that we have good health or that we at least control the virus and become undetectable,” Robbins noted. “The knowledge gap of someone believing that they can just stop taking their medication because they feel better is certainly startling, and it just showcases that we need to do a better job of educating people.

People under 35 accounted for 56 percent of new HIV diagnoses in 2017, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit organization that focuses on national health issues. Robbins noted that, for the first time, the survey exposed a knowledge gap among generations regarding HIV prevention and treatment.

But, he warned, “I think it would be a mistake for us to overly think and point fingers as to why a knowledge gap exists. The first thing we’ve got to know is why that knowledge gap exists, and now we do for the first time.”

As an activist, Robbins acknowledged that he often forgets that people outside his bubble do not talk about HIV as much as he does. “As somebody that is a positive person, instead of saying there is a huge knowledge gap, [say] there is a huge amount of potential for knowledge and growth,” he said.
Judge: Stacy Bailey case can move forward

Ruling declares one parent’s complaint can’t be basis for discrimination against an LGBT teacher

DAVID TAFFET | Senior Staff Writer
taffet@dallasvoice.com

Judge Sam Lindsey, in a ruling denying a motion by Mansfield Independent School District to dismiss a lawsuit against the district by a lesbian teacher, referred to the U.S Constitution’s Equal Protection Clause and quoted from the U.S. Supreme Court’s Romer v. Evans ruling that voided a Colorado constitutional amendment prohibiting any legislation or judicial action that protected anyone based on sexual orientation.

Mansfield elementary school art teacher Stacy Bailey had filed suit against the district in May 2018 after she was put on administrative leave and then reassigned to a high school because she let her class know she was engaged to another woman.

“The ‘negative reaction’ some members of the community may have to homosexuals is not a proper basis for discriminating against them,” Lindsey wrote in his opinion, which also referred to Brown v. Board of Ed. He said the parent’s and school district’s perceptions of homosexuality were based on “unsupported assumptions, outdated stereotypes and animosity,” making those perceptions “necessarily irrational.”

“The question, therefore, is whether bias concerning Bailey’s sexual orientation furnishes a rational basis for Mansfield I.S.D.’s decision to place her on an eight-month administrative leave,” Lindsey wrote in his decision, “and, ultimately, not allow her to return as a teacher to Charlotte Anderson Elementary School.”

He wrote that on the face of the pleadings, there’s no job-related justification for putting Bailey on her eight-month administrative leave and then refusing to give her back her job. Then he wrote that the school district failed to argue how her sexual orientation bears any ra-

IMPORTANT FACTS FOR BIKTARVY®
This is only a brief summary of important information about BIKTARVY and does not replace talking to your healthcare provider about your condition and your treatment.

MOST IMPORTANT INFORMATION ABOUT BIKTARVY
BIKTARVY may cause serious side effects, including:
- Worsening of Hepatitis B (HBV) infection. If you have both HIV-1 and HBV, your HBV may suddenly get worse if you stop taking BIKTARVY. Do not stop taking BIKTARVY without first talking to your healthcare provider, as they will need to check your health regularly for several months.

ABOUT BIKTARVY
BIKTARVY is a complete, 1-pill, once-a-day prescription medicine used to treat HIV-1 in adults. It can either be used in people who have never taken HIV-1 medicines before, or people who are replacing their current HIV-1 medicines and whose healthcare provider determines they meet certain requirements.

BIKTARVY does not cure HIV-1 or AIDS. HIV-1 is the virus that causes AIDS.

Do NOT take BIKTARVY if you also take a medicine that contains:
- dofetilide
- rifampin
- any other medicines to treat HIV-1

BEFORE TAKING BIKTARVY
Tell your healthcare provider if you:
- Have or have had any kidney or liver problems, including hepatitis infection.
- Have any other health problems.
- Are pregnant or plan to become pregnant. It is not known if BIKTARVY can harm your unborn baby. Tell your healthcare provider if you become pregnant while taking BIKTARVY.
- Are breastfeeding (nursing) or plan to breastfeed. Do not breastfeed. HIV-1 can be passed to the baby in breast milk.

Tell your healthcare provider about all the medicines you take:
- Keep a list that includes all prescription and over-the-counter medicines, antacids, laxatives, vitamins, and herbal supplements, and show it to your healthcare provider and pharmacist.
- BIKTARVY and other medicines may affect each other. Ask your healthcare provider and pharmacist about medicines that interact with BIKTARVY, and ask if it is safe to take BIKTARVY with all your other medicines.

POSSIBLE SIDE EFFECTS OF BIKTARVY
BIKTARVY may cause serious side effects, including:
- Those in the “Most Important Information About BIKTARVY” section.
- Changes in your immune system. Your immune system may get stronger and begin to fight infections. Tell your healthcare provider if you have any new symptoms after you start taking BIKTARVY.
- Kidney problems, including kidney failure. Your healthcare provider should do blood and urine tests to check your kidneys. If you develop new or worse kidney problems, they may tell you to stop taking BIKTARVY.
- Too much lactic acid in your blood (lactic acidosis), which is a serious but rare medical emergency that can lead to death. Tell your healthcare provider right away if you get these symptoms: weakness or being more tired than usual, unusual muscle pain, being short of breath or fast breathing, stomach pain with nausea and vomiting, cold or blue hands and feet, feel dizzy or lightheaded, or a fast or abnormal heartbeat.
- Severe liver problems, which in rare cases can lead to death. Tell your healthcare provider right away if you get these symptoms: skin or the white part of your eyes turns yellow, dark “tea-colored” urine, light-colored stools, loss of appetite for several days or longer, nausea, or stomach-area pain.
- The most common side effects of BIKTARVY in clinical studies were diarrhea (6%), nausea (6%), and headache (5%).

These are not all the possible side effects of BIKTARVY. Tell your healthcare provider right away if you have any new symptoms while taking BIKTARVY.

You are encouraged to report negative side effects of prescription drugs to the FDA. Visit www.FDA.gov/medwatch, or call 1-800-FDA-1088.

Your healthcare provider will need to do tests to monitor your health before and during treatment with BIKTARVY.

HOW TO TAKE BIKTARVY
Take BIKTARVY 1 time each day with or without food.

GET MORE INFORMATION
- This is only a brief summary of important information about BIKTARVY. Talk to your healthcare provider or pharmacist to learn more.

Although it’s been more than 20 years since she was a victim of human trafficking, Chong Kim’s life is still threatened by those who kidnapped and trafficked her. While not every story of forced prostitution is as dramatic, her life from the time she was kidnapped until she escaped through a hotel ventilation duct reads like something out of James Bond.

Rachelle Mendonca is a psychologist who works with human trafficking victims. In North Texas, human trafficking is a $99 million industry, she said. And those who manage to escape their captors need drug treatment, counseling to deal with the sexual abuse they endured, medical care to address physical abuse they suffered and training in life skills they never acquired during their captivity.

To help what she says is only a small fraction of those who have been victims of human trafficking, Mendonca is opening Bochy’s Place, a home where women can live for up to two years while receiving counseling, training and treatment. “We set them up for success,” she said.

Chong Kim is one of the women Mendonca has worked to help other victims, and she described Kim as particularly helpful because she was a victim herself.

Kim, who identifies herself at times as bi, grew up in Oklahoma. She said she was beaten by her mother and abused from the age of 3. In 1994, when she was in her late teens, she moved to Dallas and met a man who, she said, was posing as a Marine. After they were together a few weeks, he told her he wanted to take her to Florida to meet his parents.

Rather than driving Kim to Florida, he instead took her to an abandoned house in Enid, Okla.

“I’m geographically challenged,’’ she said, explaining why didn’t realize until then they were driving in the wrong direction.

Once they arrived, her captor told her, “You’re going to do what I say.” Here was this Marine who had told her she was beautiful, she said. So, when he choked her, raped her and beat her, her first reaction was to wonder what she had done wrong. After all, that was how she had been raised, Kim said.

After three weeks in captivity, Kim escaped. She ran to a shopping center, but no one there would help her. And when her captor caught up with her, grabbed her by the hair and took her back to the house where he began making frantic phone calls. Someone should have been by to pick her up already.

Finally, two men came and transported her to a reservation in Nevada.

From there, Kim said, she was “sent out” with 20 to 30 other women to a variety of places around the country. They would be put in a truck and driven to the first location. There, a madam would choose a few of them, then send the rest on to the next location, where maybe five would be chosen. The kidnapped women were left to work at those locations for a week or two before being moved on to the next location or taken back to the reservation.

The women were forced to work naked, Kim said, and the only choice she had was to cooperate, adding, “The only way I could get out of that was to become a madam.”

She was, she said, constantly terrorized. “If you have a baby, they take the baby,” Kim said. If you cooperated, you might get to see your baby. “They’ll torture your best friend, [telling you], ‘You shoot her, or I’ll shoot you,’” she said. “If you’re so sore from having sex with men, you’ll have sex with girls. Everything is about survival.”

After a year and a half in captivity, Kim did manage to escape. She was working at Caesar’s Palace in Las Vegas and had befriended people on the maintenance staff. One of her few fond memories of childhood was watching James Bond movies with her father, so just like in those movies, she asked the staff about a way to escape though a back entrance.

They told her how to escape her room through a ventilation duct and then get off that floor by sliding down a laundry chute. When she went down that chute, she said, she landed in a pile of sheets, startling the women pulling sheets from the basket and putting them in a washer.

But she got up, brushed herself off as if everything were totally normal and walked out a service entrance to the hotel. Someone driving a Mercedes near the hotel picked her up, she said, and she carjacked him to make her getaway.

From there, Kim moved around quite a bit, just trying to stay just a step ahead of the traffickers. She became roommates with three gay men in Raleigh for a few months, but when she got an anonymous call warning her that the traffickers knew where she was, she moved to another city.

Then Kim moved back to Dallas, and here she found a group that helped women get out of trafficking. But it was a Christian group that wanted to baptize her, so she left and found a friendlier program in Minnesota.

Kim said she found that 12-step programs didn’t work for her in battling her drug addictions, because she always got stuck on the step requiring her to say she was powerless over her addictions. She never felt powerless, she declared; if she were powerless, she would have continued submitting to her captors.

By 1999, Kim was back in Dallas. She met a man, got married and became pregnant. But before her son was born, her husband was dead.

Since escaping, Kim has worked as a consultant to the FBI, beginning when an FBI agent came to her door asking for help with Korean and Chinese organized crime. Kim is Korean. Her work, she Improving a current relationship, reconsidering an old one

Dear Candy,
I’m finding it difficult to bring up to my partner that I’d like to try couples counseling. It isn’t that things are wrong; they’re just not completely right. He’s very pessimistic, and I don’t want him to blame himself for my wanting to seek third-party help. How can I break the ice on this difficult conversation?
—Wanting Help

Dear Wanting Help,
The best way to set up an important conversation is to ask your partner when a good time would be for the two of you to have about a 30-minute conversation. Give him the topic of the conversation so he doesn’t have to wonder what’s up with you and him. No alcohol; no TV; put down electronic devices. Find a place in the house where you are sitting and facing each other.

Use what is called a “soft start-up.” The data shows that whether using either a soft start-up or harsh start-up, the rest of the conversation will stay in that style.

Think about the two to three messages you want to give to your partner. For example, “It isn’t that things are wrong; they’re just not completely right.” Or, “It isn’t about one of us; it’s about both of us, and how we connect and relate to one another.” Say, “I believe that couples counseling can help us have a more fulfilling relationship.”

These are the messages you put in your letter to me stated above.

Couples Counseling is not only appropriate for problems within a relationship but also for helping a couple have better conversations and, therefore, better connections.
—Good luck, Candy

Dear Candy,
I had a catastrophic breakup with my ex-girlfriend this time last year, and, while it didn’t end well, deep down we can’t deny that there will always be something there. Recently, she reached out to me to rekindle our flame, but I’m very hesitant to put myself back in a situation that ended messy. What should my next step be?
—Hesitant

Dear Hesitant,
I’ve heard people talk about a relationship in terms of love. “It can’t be over, because we love each other.” But a relationship takes more than just love. It takes respect, trust, dependability, commitment, teamwork and friendship. Love alone is not enough.

I know that last sentence is not very romantic. But it is reality. Friendship is a very important characteristic of a healthy and fulfilling partnership. Sure, it’s about whether you love her. But do you like her?

Listen to yourself. I hear real concern on your part about getting involved with your ex again. Whatever your concern and hesitation are about, pay attention to you. It may also help to run this reunion with friends and family who know you two. Their feedback may help you make that decision of letting the past stay in the past or giving it another go.
—Good luck, Candy

Note to my younger self:
Don’t ever give up hope

Dear Jeff,
It’s 1989, you’re 30 years old. And you are about to hear the most terrifying words you’ll ever hear in your entire life: You are HIV positive. Your world will come crashing down around you, and you’ll feel alone and full of shame.
I want you to know that you’re going to be OK.

I know it doesn’t seem this way right now, but you’ll be all right. Telling the people closest to you — your partner, your family and your friends — will be difficult and emotional for you. But they will still love you, just the same. They’ll support and lift you up, in good times and bad, even when things seem darkest, and you are forced to face your demons.

You’ll find a good doctor, but right now there is only one drug to treat HIV — AZT — and it doesn’t really work when taken by itself. So, your doctor will refer you to a therapist to help you deal with your diagnosis.

While in therapy, you’ll reveal to another human for the first time that you were abused as a child by your father, a secret that you swore you would take to your grave. You won’t be able to even look the therapist in the eye, and your own eyes will be full of tears and sadness. But he will comfort and guide you, and from there you will embark on a lifelong journey of healing and forgiveness.

You’ll continue with your college education in the midst of your diagnosis and finally get that degree that seemed impossible a few years ago. You will be happy.

When you go to an HIV support group for help, you’ll be put on a mailing list to receive Positively Aware magazine where you’ll read and learn about the virus. You’ll start volunteering for TPAN, the agency that produces the magazine, and eventually be hired to answer phones and perform data entry, and one day you will become editor.

It will become your life’s work and your proudest achievement.
Your partner Jim will propose to you, and you will say, “Yes!” You’ll have a commitment ceremony and buy a condo together. Eventually your 16-year relationship will end, but you will remain friends for life.

But life will once again turn dark and scary.

Soon after you and Jim break up, Mom’s long fight with cancer will come to an end, and you and your family will be by her side as she draws her last breath at home in bed — her final wish. While your biggest fan and one of your greatest teachers in life will be physically gone, she will live on in your heart and your memories. Her love and her grace will continue to guide you throughout your life.

Your future husband, Stephen, you’ll meet at a bar not long after you move out to live on your own. You’ll fall madly in love and eventually move in and build a life together and will one day legally marry (Yes, you will be able to do that!).

You’ll live long enough to take advantage of effective antiretroviral therapy, unlike many of your friends.

Warning: Those early drugs have some pretty severe side effects. Hang in there! The kidney stones from Crizivan and diarrhea from Viracept will eventually be replaced by medications that are easier to take with fewer and fewer side effects, until one day, decades later, you’ll be on one pill, once a day.

The greatest gift and opportunity in life will come when you are given a platform to share your story of survival and help others share their own stories, too. It is not something that you will take lightly. You understand that you have a responsibility to get the facts right and to be willing to admit when you are wrong or have made a mistake.

You will be given great license to be creative in the work you do, and you’ll travel around the world and meet amazing advocates and researchers who are working to end the epidemic.

While there will certainly be bumps along the way, know that you’re not alone on this journey. Don’t be afraid to ask for help, and when you give back and help others along the way, you’ll get so much back in return.

The world will be very different in 30 years, but hope has sustained you this far, and so it will continue to do so. Don’t ever give up hope.

Take care of yourself.

Rainbow-colored Christmas

Parodist Randy Rainbow out with new music for a caroliscious CD of holiday tunes

Look out Mariah Carey! Randy Rainbow has released a Christmas album that rivals yours. Hey Gurl, It's Christmas (Broadway Records) has everything you want to unwrap in a Randy Rainbow holiday recording.

The title track, co-written by Rainbow and Marc Shaiman, is seasonally sassy, combines a sense of humor with the spirit of the holidays. Rainbow’s take on “I Saw Mommy Kissing Santa Claus” features Kathy Griffin and Alan Cumming playing his shrinks. Norm Lewis joins Rainbow for the more straightforward “Merry Christmas Darling/What Are You Doing New Year’s Eve” medley, which is followed by the hilarious “My Favorite Things” parody number “Trump’s Favorite Things,” featuring Trump impersonator John DiDomenico.

And all of this is before Rainbow is joined by Lorna Luft on “Santa Claus Is Coming to Town.”

We chatted with Rainbow about teaming with celebrity collaborators and how a live show differs from YouTube. — Gregg Shapiro

Dallas Voice: You’re known for your parodies. What would you say are the challenges and rewards of writing a new Christmas song, such as the title track of your new album? Randy Rainbow: I found limited challenges — it was only rewarding. It was exciting for me, because I got to work with Marc Shaiman, who is an idol of mine. We sat in the room where he wrote Hairspray and Smash and Mary Poppins Returns, among other amazing things. It was really exciting. If there was a challenge… I originally set out to write the gayest Christmas song we possibly could, as I told Marc. I realized, as I was writing the lyrics, that I wanted to add some substance and some kind of angle to it. I ended up gearing it more towards my specific audience, which is like so many people, consumed with news and social media. It became my musical prescription to dial it back for the holidays and enjoy yourself a little bit.

Being a Jewish songwriter yourself, why do you think so many of the best and most enduring carols, including “White Christmas,” “The Christmas Song,” “Silver Bells,” “Winter Wonderland,” “It’s The Most Wonderful Time of the Year,” “Rudolph the Red Nosed Reindeer” and “I’ll Be Home For Christmas” were written by Jewish composers?

Because we know we’re going to get paid at the end [laughs]. It’s an interesting thing. As a Jewish writer-person, I don’t know if I can be objective about that. For some reason, it’s in our DNA that we write good Christmas music. Maybe it’s because there’s no pressure. We’re kind of removed from it enough to just have a good time and write something that’s creatively satisfying. We’re not thinking about all of the other mishugas.

Hey Gurl, It’s Christmas has a marvelous lineup of guest artists including Lorna Luft, Kathy Griffin, Alan Cumming, Norm Lewis and Trump impersonator John Di Domenico. What does it mean to you to have that kind of artistic support? It’s amazing! That’s been one of the most thrilling parts of getting some notoriety. Getting to connect with so many of my heroes. This was the first opportunity to present that in a concrete sort of way in that I got to collaborate with them.
The fact that they all said yes as soon as I asked them was mind-boggling to me. These are people who have been heroes of mine for many years, so to be associated with them on any level is a thrill.

Di Domenico can be heard on your brilliant parody song “Trump’s Favorite Things.” Have you heard from the Trump clan regarding any of your parodies of them? The actual Trump clan? I’ve not heard from anybody. I’ve not even been blocked yet on Twitter, although I try every day. I have heard from some whistleblowers that I do have fans within the administration. I’m assuming it’s Melania, although I have no concrete evidence.

You also perform more straightforward renditions of “Merry Christmas, Darling/What Are You Doing New Year’s Eve?” “Make Someone Happy” and “The Christmas Movie Medley.” How important was it for you to show that side of yourself? It was very important to me but more important to my mother, who relishes mostly in the compliments that people like my singing. To have the opportunity to showcase a little more of the non-comedic part of that was very nice. Kind of my Hanukkah gift to her.

You have a series of concert dates through January. How is that experience unique? It was kind of a challenge at the beginning to figure out how we would translate this video experience that people were liking to the live stage. It was kind of easy for me because I started out on stage. As a kid, when I was in Florida, I was playing shows on the condo circuit and doing regional theater. I was familiar with that format. It was a challenge to find a team to work with me. I found my musical director, Jesse Kissel, who did a great job in taking the arrangements that I threw together for myself for the videos and turned them into live musical experiences. I have a great band, some of Broadway’s best musicians, behind me. It brought it to a new level and added a new layer to what I was already doing.

You offer a “Randy Rainbow for President 2020” T-shirt. What can you tell the readers about your platform as a candidate? My platform is really just selling merchandise. So, I’m glad it worked, and you bought a T-shirt. I don’t know if we really want me to run for president. You never know what could happen. To be slightly more serious, I hope that if I’m doing anything with these videos, it’s injecting a little bit of humor and levity into these dark times. I hope that people remember to laugh as much as possible.
‘The L-Word’ reboots with a more inclusive ‘Generation Q’

Airing for six seasons starting in 2004, Showtime’s The L-Word offered a Sapphic-centric L.A.-set successor to Queer As Folk. While groundbreaking, audacious and sexy (more than 110 sex scenes during its run!), creator Ilene Chaiken and her creative team were responsible for one of the most loathed, insane — literally! — main characters on cable TV: Jenny Schecter (Mia Kirschner), whose unsolved murder served as framework and point of contention during the show’s final season and a well-meaning but unflattering, inaccurate, cringe-y trans representation in Max (Danielle Sea).

But redemption is a theme in America. On Dec. 8, Showtime will premiere a follow-up series, The L-Word: Generation Q, with Marja-Lewis Ryan as showrunner. And boy! Does it acknowledge and make up for the sins of the past with ethnic diversity both in front of and behind the camera — including Latina screenwriters Tatiana Suarez-Pico (Parenthood) and Nancy Mejía (Vida); authentic trans representation; and socially aware, hugely entertaining, drama-filled storylines involving both the original’s characters and a fresh batch of new “Gen Q” faces.

Today, Bette Porter (Jennifer Beals) is running for mayor while raising teenage daughter Angie (Jordan Hull), who may be nursing an adolescent queer crush on a bad influence bestie, Jordi (trans actress Sophie Giannamore). Alice (Leisha Hailey) has a new, Ellen-ish TV talk show and is dating Gigi (Sepideh Moafi), a Realtor with kids and a meddlesome ex-wife. And wealthy lesbian lothario hairstylist Shane (Katherine Moennig) has just returned to L.A.

As for the show’s Gen Q, Sophie (Rosanny Zayas) is a producer on Alice’s show and lives with girlfriend Dani (Arienne Mandi), a PR executive working for her father’s lucrative yet opioid-related business. The couple’s transgender roommate, Micah (Leo Sheng), is an adjunct professor with the hots for a new gay neighbor, Jose (Fred-dy Miyares), while Sarah (Jacqueline Toboni), an Olympic swimmer turned assistant on Alice’s show, parties hard while cozying up to her wishlist mentor, Shane. We got some scoop on Gen Q, how the old and new casts mixed and whether Pam Grier’s Kit Porter will make an appearance. We spoke with Zayas and Mandi, both of whom are single and identify as pansexual (“I’m open to falling in love with someone’s personality and how we connect as people,” Zayas says).

— Lawrence Ferber

Dallas Voice: Dani is described as “complicated.” Can you elaborate, and hint at what’s in store for her? Arienne Mandi: Dani is born into a family that she worked very hard for and is really bound to her father. It’s just been them against the world. During the course of the season, she’s experiencing the feeling that maybe everything she assumed and thought would be her world isn’t what she wants. I can relate to being told something your whole life and having your thoughts change about the world and people and what drives you and what you’re passionate about. Making your own opinions and really honoring what you want and who you are as a person.

How about Sophie? Rosanny Zayas: I believe Sophie’s a hard worker and always had big dreams and goals, and one of them is to help Alice create a show that’s relatable, queer, open, and honest about how Alice lives her life today, which is really cool. When The L-Word first came out, you saw Alice finding herself, Now Alice has her own show, and she’s killing it, and Sophie is helping her step into her voice even more.

And what is Sophie and Dani’s dynamic like as a couple? Zayas: I think you’ll see the ups and downs, and Dani’s character is a very strong person, forward in what she wants, and you see Sophie as the heart of the relationship and a lot of times having to take on the emotional life and confronting things Dani doesn’t want to talk about. You’ll see how much they love each other and how much they will be there for each other, just like any other relationship.

Mandi: Sophie is Dani’s anchor throughout the course of the season, and we experience changes together.

Do you relate personally to your respective characters and their relationship? Mandi: Yeah. I pulled a lot from my own life, and some things from my mother. I grew up in L.A. My mother is Chilean and my father is Iranian, and Dani is mixed ethnicity, too. The cultural upbringing is very much me. And I think I’m a lot like Dani. She keeps a lot of things very close to her, and I’m the same way. I’m not quick to divulge. It was really visceral to go through some of the things she does.

Zayas: Well, I’m a Dominican from New York, and Sophie is, too, and I think that Sophie’s heart is my heart. The writing has been so amazing; they created a specific relationship between these two people, and there have been moments they went through that I think about and can remember a woman I was so hurt by, and also felt so incredibly loved by another person that I can bring this into my relationship with Dani and Sophie.

Is there a correlation between the Gen Q newbies and original’s characters? Like is one the new Shane, the new Alice, etc.? Mandi: I think what’s great about the new Gen Q is we’re so diverse, but if I had to relate Dani to somebody else, it would be Bette. We’re very different in our backgrounds, but we struggle with family issues, and we’re both powerful and calculating in the same way. But all the new characters sort of speak for themselves and are very original and fresh.

Zayas: I think Sophie’s a new creation. There...
Today is a sad day: This is likely my last review ever of a Volkswagen Beetle; the Bug will be discontinued after 2019. It’s an especially sanguine feeling because, like millions of drivers, I have fond memories of the car. I’ve of course driven many over the years, but I remember riding in the back of my uncle’s orange Beetle in the ’70s... I was at the unveiling of the New Beetle in 1998 ... I owned a 2005 edition for six years. But the car we have here may be my favorite of the bunch.

You’re looking at the 2019 VW Beetle Final Edition, which is a fancy way of saying the Beetle is going out in a fancy way. The shape defines iconic, essentially the same for 80 years, but it’s snazzy in its final form. LED driving lights, 18-in. white disc alloy wheels and rear spoiler distinguish it. Of course, the bug-eye headlamps, horseshoe taillamps, bulging fenders and gently curved beltline remain. A beige canvas top contrasts with metallic paint. Classy.

Click open the door and scoot inside where body color dash and door panels connect to the original Beetles — as does the Kaferfach upper glovebox with satin silver latch. Weather permitting, press one button to retract the roof. VW keeps it simple with large analog gauges and a flat bottom steering wheel. Luxuries come in the form of heated diamond-stitched leather seats, dual zone automatic climate control, rain-sensing wipers and swipescreen for audio and navigation. I could listen to the crisp Fender audio system for the next 80 years. Safety is enhanced by a rearview camera and blind spot warnings.

If you’re only familiar with driving classic Beetles, I should tell you there’s no chirpy little engine hanging out back. Nope — the front-drive car goes forth with a turbocharged 2.0-liter 4-cylinder dishing out 174 horses and 184 lb.-ft. of torque, all routed through a 6-speed automatic transmission with manual shift mode. Power is dropped smoothly to the road. It’s no rocket, but there’s plenty to move this compact with a sense off vigor. Step lightly to see 26/33-MPG city/hwy.

The Beetle cruises comfortably on its four-wheel independent suspension.
For the cast of Cara Mia’s ‘Swimming While Drowning,’ the pitfalls visited upon queer Latin youth strike close to home.

JOHN CARDER MCCLANAHAN  |  Contributing Writer
john.mcclanahan91@gmail.com

Set in a large city’s LGBTQ youth shelter, Emilio Rodriguez’s Swimming While Drowning is a fictional coming-of-age story of two teenagers, Angelo and Mila, who seek asylum after they’re forced to leave home because of their queer identities. And after they become roommates, they form a bond and learn to address internal struggle while trying to survive in the face of destitution.

The play delves into issues of child homelessness and queer identity in the Latinx community. But for the show’s two actors, it means much more than playing roles: It’s about portraying experiences that eerily resemble their own lives.

“It’s kind of a cathartic thing for me,” says Dominic Pecikonis, who portrays Angelo, the dreamer of the two. “The things that these characters go through and the growth that they have are things that I wish I had as a queer person growing up.”

He found the opportunity important enough that he flew back from New York to his native Dallas when producers with Cara Mía Theatre Co. invited him to play Angelo for this regional premiere. Although he’s now 26, Pecikonis connects with Angelo as someone who is “creepily similar” to himself; during rehearsals, he had to conjure the vulnerability he felt as a teenager.

“I knew I had to do it because it feels bigger than just doing a play,” he says. “We’re focusing on people who don’t get enough attention, and I feel it’s going to start some conversation that needs to be had.”

Opposite Pecikonis is J. Davis-Jones as the mixed-race streetwise hustler Mila, another runaway who Angelo eventually confides to.

Rodriguez originally wrote Mila as a gay male character, but with the playwright’s permission, Cara Mía’s creative team made him transgender specifically for Davis-Jones, who is trans. This offered Davis-Jones the opportunity to embrace a role and share it with the audience reflective of genderfluidity. But Mila’s gender does not define the narrative.

“I hope the audience understands that the show is not about the fact that Mila is trans,” Davis-Jones says. “I feel like when you see a show that includes a transgender character, that’s the whole production. But this is about two people living their lives and trying to be resilient. It’s not about the gender; it’s about the journey.”

Davis-Jones knows Mila’s journey, because he lived it. Not long ago, he turned to CitySquare TRAC, a Dallas nonprofit that provides housing for homeless youth who need to escape dangerous living situations. He recalled several other young LGBTQ folks he met at CitySquare who, like his character, fled to the shelter out of desperation.

“It was very sad to see that,” says Davis-Jones, now 23. “A lot of the people there were younger than me. Being able to be a part of this show and dive into this process from the point of view of a 15-year-old hurts my heart, because I was 21 or 22 going into that process — at least I was an adult and could figure it out a little bit better. I don’t know how I would have survived if I were 15.”

Davis-Jones connects with Mila, understanding the urgency to seek safer environments. The 23-year-old actor lived Mila’s life and hopes to capture on stage what he witnessed while staying at a shelter — youth swept away by bigoted whirlwinds of race and sexual identity.

“Something I realized when I was in that situation and part of CitySquare TRAC is that a lot of kids put in that situation were put in that situation,” Davis-Jones says. They had to run away because they were in dangerous situa-
J. Davis-Jones and Dominic Pecikonis relate deeply to the characters they are playing in ‘Swimming While Drowning.’

Neither performer has acted in a play quite like Swimming While Drowning. Both embraced a challenge to relive memories and feel scars left from their teen years. And now, as they channel themselves through Mila and Angelo, Davis-Jones and Pecikonis hope their performance will start conversations about LGBTQ youth and Dallas’ homeless children. were Hispanic characters on the show before, but I don’t think they’ve been as specific as being Dominican from New York. Even when it comes to the ethnic food she eats, that’s something that wasn’t specifically in the show before but you get to see now.

How did the new and original casts go about getting to know each other? Was there a lot of bonding? Mandi: We call them the OGs: Kate, Leisha and Jennifer. They really extended themselves to us and actually organized a dinner the first week of shooting. We sat at dinner for hours and talked. We made it a point to hang out outside of work, and they really opened their doors to us and made sure we felt super comfortable but also experienced things on their own like they did. It felt like a family.

Zayas: As just a fan of the show, you don’t get to see how the OGs are in real life, but it’s been so awesome to see how well they connect. They actually do love and take care of each other and fight for each other during the process of making the show. It’s been a learning experience for me, and I’ve been admiring them every day, wanting to be more and more like them.

Would you ever bring up Jenny and how she died, or is it like Candyman, Beetlejuice and Bloody Mary and nobody dares intone that name for dread of summoning her? Mandi: Oh my god. She wasn’t my favorite character, that’s for sure. I do like the actress, Mia Kirshner, but Jenny’s character was definitely not my favorite! I feel like there are online forums for just bashing poor Jenny. She definitely pumped up the drama.

Zayas: All of us are fans of the show, so there are always questions about Jenny and what happened. I think I’ll leave that up to the writers.

Will we see Pam Grier’s Kit Porter again? Mandi: I can’t answer! There will definitely be special guest appearances. I’m not saying from the past [series], but a lot of guest appearances, which is really exciting.

Zayas: I feel it’s changing every day, the way the world is. I can say that everyone is working as hard as they can to make sure it’s as accurate as possible. The writers, creators, actors, costume design — we want to make sure this relays what we see today.

Mandi: Our set was incredibly queer — our directors, producers, our showrunner. It’s still a lesbian show, but it’s branched out as so much more now. We had everyone on the spectrum. It’s pretty wonderful.

Of course, I have to ask about the original show’s infamous “Chart,” which mapped out the characters’ sexual and emotional connections. Is there one hanging in the writer’s room this time, too? Are there already too many lines to fit? Mandi: Not so much, but I see so many Post-Its and arrows. They have the overview of the season and where things go. All these things are subject to change, but it follows each person’s drama.

Even with the top deployed, there’s very little cowl shake, and the car handles as good as a little car should. In typical VW fashion, the suspension just rumbles over rough city streets and washboard country roads with little drama, but turns crisply when commanded. It’s a car you can enjoy on a thousand-mile journey or just to the ice cream shop with kids in the back.

I’ve relished many Beetles. There was the Dune we reviewed last year, and a base baby blue one I drove in California four years ago. But none were as elegant as the Final Edition. So why is VW killing it? Well, it’s a very good car in a crossover world. Which makes me wonder why VW didn’t echo the Fiat 500X and turn the Beetle into a cool little crossover. With the advent of electric vehicles, I bet the car will return again without a gasoline engine. It’s too hard to imagine an automotive world without a VW Beetle. Given a base price of $20,895 (or $30,890 for our test car), you don’t have to imagine your garage without one.

TBT brings back Tchaikovsky’s timeless Christmas ballet

Texas Ballet Theater’s production of The Nutcracker is as much a seasonal tradition as DTC’s Christmas Carol or the Cowboys missing the playoffs. And just as traditionally, audiences in both Dallas and Fort Worth can see Clara cherish a toy brought to her by the peculiar Herr Drosselmeyer turn an ordinary Christmas Eve into a parade of colorful creatures, all set to Tchaikovsky’s beautiful music.

Epic tragedy ‘Miss Saigon’ choppers into Bass Hall

Despite being from the same team, Miss Saigon was never the runaway hit that Les Miserables was, but this modern updating of Madame Butterfly has enjoyed its own kind of success. Set in Vietnam during the U.S. involvement, it tracks an American soldier, the woman he loves and a devious manipulator called The Engineer as they endure hardship, tragedy and romance during wartime. It plays for one week at Bass Hall.

Jenny Block on managing expectations during the holidays

The holidays shouldn’t be stressful. Shouldn’t be. They should be a time to relax and regroup and reconnect, spend time with family — chosen or blood — or much-needed time alone (as you wish). They should be a time to give and receive, if that’s something you and yours enjoy.

It should be a time of “yes.”

Instead it too often feels like a time of “no.”

No, you can’t have that.
No, I don’t want to see them.
No, there isn’t enough time or money or fill-in-the-blank.

The reason why is simple: unrealistic expectations.

This week, I saw an article on BuzzFeed that a dad had created sharing his 10-year-old daughter’s Christmas list. Ten. Years. Old. It included things like Gucci slides, essential oils, AirPods, a Chanel purse, and $4,000 hard cash.

People responded with witty retorts, saying she had her priorities straight and, essentially, “You go, girl!”

One tweet caught my eye. It basically said, “You raised her like this, now deal with it.”

In other words, “These are her expectations, instilled by you, and now you have to pay the price.”

I don’t know that it’s really the dad’s fault. My daughter still thinks she’s going to drive a Mercedes G Wagon one day, which is about as likely as my playing for the NBA. I’ve told her as much. So I don’t blame the dad necessarily. I blame all of us.

Things have gotten out of hand. From expectations about Rockwellian family gatherings around the hearth to gift lists that are based on social media and reality TV (instead of reality), we’ve gone off the rails when it comes to what we expect, which can lead to only one thing in the end: disappointment. Completely and totally unnecessary disappointment.

If you know that most people don’t fly to Aspen for Christmas or exchange gifts with five-figure price tags or adore every single person in their family with whom they’ve only gotten more so as social media and reality TV have started to truly take the place of reality, which is sometimes considered “false facts” despite the fact that we can actually see it ourselves.

Maybe everyone does have a happy family who can’t wait to gather round the yule and relate stories from days of yore. Maybe every woman is 5-foot-10 and 130 pounds and eats whatever she wants. Maybe every parent gets their child $10,000-plus worth of Christmas gifts. Except for me, of course. And if that becomes my reality, everything is going to be a disappointment. Nothing will make me happy.

I’m a relatively non-practicing Jew. I happen to like Christmas time — the non-secular solstice celebration marked by trees and presents and pretty lights. I can also appreciate a holiday that, despite it all, does seem to do it’s best to be one steeped in love and togetherness and peace, despite all of the trappings. Still I find it a challenge to rise above it all.

I still want my tree to glisten and my cookies to inspire awe and my gifts to the people I love to be the perfect ones. But what I do not want to do is ruin a lovely holiday because of or based on those things. Needles fall from trees. Cookies aren’t always Insta-worthy. Some presents will be misfires. This year, I’m going to focus on saying, “I don’t care about all of that. All I care about is being with the people I love and being grateful for the life I live and honoring the one time of the year that most of us are given the chance to slow down and smell the pine trees.”

So as you settle into your post-Turkey Day/Black Friday stupor, it’s a challenge I’d like to extend to all of you.

Realign your expectations when it comes to what you want the holidays to look like.

Think: Is that reasonable? Is that possible?

Is that even what I really want to do, give, have, etc? If it feels like too much, bow out. If the requests have gotten too big, regroup. If you no longer enjoy the season, step back and make some new choices that will allow you to breathe and appreciate this sweet time. Watch some Hallmark movies, eat some peppermint bark. Snuggle in with your family or friends or fur babies or, heck, yourself and recharge. The new year will be upon us before you know it. Time to enjoy the old year, old you before the new year, new you starts vying for your attention.
