In a post on Facebook, the Pride San Antonio organization wrote: “It is with immense sadness that we announce that the ICONIC Texas drag legend Sweet Savage passed away this morning. Savage has died following a lengthy illness. Thanks so much for making San Antonio a little SWEETER and for PROUDLY representing our city. We will miss you beyond belief. Thanks so much for helping Pride Bigger Than Texas get to where we are today. From the days of Gay Pride SA to Pride San Antonio, you have been a major influence. Rest in peace Miss US of A … Rest In Peace.”

Sweet Savage, born and raised in Edinburg, Texas, just north of McAllen, began her drag career in the 1980s and quickly became a fan favorite around Texas. She held an extensive list of titles, including Miss Gay USofA 1993. She had an extensive drag family, giving her drag children and grandchildren the name O’Hara, which was her husband’s last name. She was drag mother to Josephine O’Hara and drag grandmother to Dallas favorites (and RuPaul’s Drag Race alums) Asia O’Hara (Season 10) and Raja O’Hara (Season 11).

Betty Neil and Michael Lybarger have announced plans for a special party celebrating Sweet Savage’s life and her legacy. Stay tuned for details.

RVA 2020: Don’t forget to vote!

Everybody has their favorites — whether it’s your favorite dance club, bartender or drag queen, your favorite taco joint or romantic date night dining spot, all the way to your favorite doctor, hair dresser, community activist or community ally.

And now’s the time to let your favorites know exactly how you feel by voting in Dallas Voice’s 2020 Readers Voice Awards.

And while voting was eventually set to end on Jan. 31, due to some technical difficulties with our website last weekend — which have now been resolved — we have extended the deadline till Feb. 7. So go vote, and get your friends to go vote — and not just because your favorites need to feel the love; everyone who votes can enter the drawing to win a package of fabulous prizes!

Vanna, tell them what they can win! Well Pat, our winner will get everything they need for a fabulous date night: $500 cash, a $100 gift card to Mattito’s restaurant and two tickets to see a TITAS performance!

Individuals can only vote once. Winners will be announced in the March 27 issue of Dallas Voice.

Cody Lynch’s Fit Queen Cuisine offers meal prep for fitness-focused folks

Cody Lynch just launched his new meal prep service, and it is already taking off. After developing a meal plan and recipes aimed at losing weight and getting back in shape himself, Lynch said, several of his friends asked if he would do the same for them. And Fit Queen Cuisine was born.

Lynch started out with three or four clients, he said. Then other people started asking him to cook for them, too, and his client list jumped to six or eight. Before he knew it, Lynch had gone from making about 65 meals a week to making about 150 meals a week. And more potential clients are asking about his service all the time. If the business grows any more, he said, he might have to consider hiring some help.

“Working on my own, I can turn out as many as 240 meals a day, but I am really more comfortable at about 60 meals a day,” he said.

A childhood passion

Lynch said his passion for cooking goes back to his childhood when he would spend vacations with his aunt in New Orleans, who taught him how to cook mouth-watering Cajun concoctions. On each visit, he said, she would teach him a new recipe. And when he graduated from high school, she gifted him with a cookbook holding all the recipes she had taught him through the years.

By his mid-20s, Lynch said, he was working as an event coordinator for the company that owned the bar BJ’s NXS, then located on Fitzhugh Avenue at Travis Street. As he juggled an increasingly hectic work schedule, Lynch said he let his personal fitness regimen slide, and before he realized it, he had packed on 80 pounds.

“One day, I really realized how much weight I had gained, and I told myself, ok, I gotta lose these extra pounds,” he recalled. So after researching some options, Lynch chose to go with the Whole30 meal plan. While he saw some success with that plan, he said he soon began to find the diet far too restrictive. There are lot of absolute no-nos with the Whole30 plan — no dairy, no added sugar, no alcohol either to drink or to use in cooking. The plan also forbids all grains, Lynch said.

The Whole30 plan is ranked low among popular diet plans because the restrictions can make it hard to stick with the plan. So Lynch said he started researching a lot of different diet plans, including the higher-ranked Mediterranean style diets and eventually developed his own formula.

With his personally customized diet plan in place, Lynch said, he managed to reach his goal weight — 170 pounds — and maintain that weight over the course of three or four years. It was his friends that noticed his success in losing the weight and keeping it off that were his first clients. Then they recommended him to their friends, and Fit Queen Cuisine came to be.

How it works

Lynch spends four days a week — every Sunday and Monday and every Wednesday and Thursday — preparing clients’ meals. By cooking twice a week rather than preparing a week’s worth of meals in advance, he said, he is better able to maintain the freshness and the flavors of the meals he creates.

Each Thursday, Lynch releases his menu for the next week. He offers six different meals a week, picking and choosing each week’s offerings from a list of 42 recipe options. Soon, he said, he plans to start adding to the recipe vault, adding a new dish every month or so.

Lynch said that his recipes work for a number of reasons, not the least among them the fact that he always uses fresh ingredients. And while he references those Cajun recipes he learned from his aunt and other dishes too, Lynch recreates that deliciousness in a lower-calorie, healthier form.

He said his recipes use no added sugars and no processed foods, “only fresh and healthy ingredients.” He also makes his own sauces and dressings rather than using pre-made, store-bought options.

“I don’t use any dairy either,” Lynch said. “I just found that it makes my body feel better to go without the dairy. And there are plenty of non-dairy options available. I use cashew milk or light coconut milk. And I make my own ‘parmesan’ [using a crushed mixture of yeast and seasonings].

“I have had several clients tell me, ‘I never knew eating healthy could taste so good.’”

Lynch’s website, FitQueenCuisine.com, details the different plans and options he offers, including the “seven meals for $75” plan. The website also details all the macros and calorie counts.
for the different recipes — none are more than 600 calories — and he will be adding nutritional labels for each recipe soon.

Fit food and more

Fit Queen Cuisine is not Lynch’s only job. He also works as the events coordinator for Legacy Counseling Center and operates Spirit Chic Boputique (an online clothing line of hand-painted “school spirit wear” started by his mother and taken over by Lynch about seven years ago). He is also involved in community activities, having served on the board of the Dallas Red Foundation, including a stint as president of the board.

“It’s really all about helping people,” Lynch said. “That’s my real passion, helping people in my community. That’s why I got involved with Legacy and with Dallas Red Foundation. And that’s really my goal with Fit Queen Cuisine. I want to help people lead healthier, happier lives.”

EBJ gets aircraft carrier named after her hometown hero

taffet@dallasvoice.com

ep. Eddie Bernice Johnson worked for years to get the Congressional Medal of Honor for Doris “Dorie” Miller, a WWII serviceman from her hometown of Waco. And on Martin Luther King Jr.’s birthday, the Navy announced it would name its next aircraft carrier after him.

Miller was a cook onboard the U.S.S. West Virginia in Pearl Harbor when the Japanese attacked on Dec. 7, 1941. He served breakfast that morning and was collecting laundry when his ship was hit by the first of seven torpedoes plus two bombs. Because Miller was black, he was not allowed to handle guns. But when his ship was attacked, he headed for his battle station and saved lives on his ship and on others by his actions. He was awarded the Navy Cross, the third highest award in that branch of the military at that time. He was the first African-American to receive that award.

Until Franklin Roosevelt’s administration, blacks couldn’t serve in the military at all. Under FDR, attendant, steward and cook positions were open. Miller enlisted in 1939 at age 19.

When the attack started, Miller heard the call to battle stations. So he raced to the deck. When he got on deck, he heard the captain had been wounded, so he raced to the bridge then carried the captain down to first aid before helping other wounded sailors to safety.

Miller saw an anti-aircraft gun not being used, so he went over to it and began shooting. Although he hadn’t been trained on the .50-caliber machine gun, he downed one of the attacking planes. He then continued to rescue other sailors before the ship sank.

In the film Pearl Harbor, Miller was portrayed by Cuba Gooding Jr.

In 1942, Miller was called home to head a war bond tour. He appeared in Waco and Dallas as well as in California. He was also featured in a 1943 U.S. Navy recruiting poster before reporting to the Puget Sound Navy Yard where he was assigned to the escort carrier U.S.S. Liscomb Bay.

Irving ISD refuses to respond to continued LGBT book censorship

annamwaugh@gmail.com

Staff at the Irving Independent School District have gone silent regarding an incident of censorship that started nearly two years ago with removing books and banning them from the district curriculum and continues to this day with bookmarked pages district leadership deem inappropriate for high school students to consume.

Yet in the work Carol Revelle and I have done since this, it’s become clear through reflection and introspection that blind loyalty to a district and fear of speaking out and facing termination are factors in remaining silent about censorship, especially when LGBT titles are still considered controversial by many in leadership.

It started in March 2018 when two teachers — Revelle and I — planned a graphic novel unit around social justice with four other English I teachers at Irving High School. The graphic novels chosen covered topics of poverty, the prison industrial complex, bullying, sexual assault and civil and LGBT rights.

It included Maus by Art Spiegelman, Speak by Laurie Halse Anderson, Monster by Walter Dean Myers, Hidden by Loïc Dauvillier, In Real Life by Cory Doctorow and Jen Wang, March by John Lewis, and Love is Love edited by Marc Andreyko.

Revelle and I feared Love is Love would cause issues because it featured the LGBT community, an area where many books face banning and challenges according to the American Library Association, which tracks censorship.

Nearly 2 years, no progress article about the ban. She told them the books were returned to teachers’ classrooms for students to read “on their own time,” confirming that the graphic novel set was still prohibited from the district curriculum. She claimed the violent images were what made Love is Love and other graphic novels “bookmarked” for their content.

“All of the graphic novels were returned from being reviewed with bookmarked pages of inappropriate images or text. What caused Love is Love to be removed from the curriculum was the GRAPHIC violence depicted at the Pulse shooting. Monster was flagged for language, Speak for sexual content,” Holden told Book Riot.

Yet in meetings with the principal, and when I reached out to Resource Center’s Rafael McDonnell and he met with state Rep. Rafael Anchia, former Irving ISD superintendent Dr. Parra, and Irving ISD’s legal counsel, that’s the only book that was discussed for censoring and eventual banning, as the legal counsel explained in a letter stating that the Love is Love books had been returned.

But according to Holden, the books remained.

Holden’s use of the term “graphic” violence is not only confusing, it’s disturbing. Revelle and I combed through that novel dozens of times to find any inappropriate or questionable material. What we found were a few images that were geared toward mature readers, which the novel’s back cover suggests. High school students fall under this category.

There’s an image of a bloody couple, still clinging onto each other as the police drape a sheet over them; images of Batman walking through the Pulse aftermath wondering how anyone can stop the hatred that caused the shooting (pictured). These images were simplistic and more representational than graphic. Other images celebrated love and the diversity of the LGBT community while a few panels use the word “faggot” as a way to teach readers how not to use hateful language.

The images in the text detail a horribly tragic and shocking event where hatred once again caused. Those in the LGBT community to fear for their safety and seek healing.

Holden did not respond to a message on Facebook asking her to clarify her comments. Therefore questions still linger, such as the ones I emailed to Nicole Mansell, Irving ISD’s executive director of communications and marketing, in September.

The questions I posed were: Why were the books initially removed? Which books are bookmarked or flagged? What do these flags look like? Are pages removed? What was the reasoning behind the bookmarking or flagging? When and why was the decision made to return the books for in-class choice reading only? Could the graphic novels be added to the curriculum in the future? Why or why not? What specific panels are graphically violent in Love is Love?

Mansell had previously sent a statement to Yahoo Lifestyle about the story, denying any books were “banned” and claiming no “recommendations were ever made to pull, ban or censor any books” by the “district librarians.” This is untrue.

I emailed Mansell the questions listed above in September and sent a follow-up email again at the end of September. She never responded.

Magda Hernández was named Irving ISD superintendent in December of 2018. After Mansell did not respond to two separate emails, I emailed Hernández.

In a move that LGBT legal activists see as “deeply worrisome,” the U.S. Supreme Court on Jan. 17 said it will review two appeals in which the Trump administration is seeking to make it much easier for employers to exclude health insurance coverage for some medical procedures by saying such procedures violate their religious beliefs or moral conscience.

The cases, Trump v. Pennsylvania and Little Sisters v. Pennsylvania, originated as lawsuits by a wide variety of groups to stop new Trump administration regulations around the Affordable Care Act. Original ACA rules required most employers to include full coverage for certain preventive care, such as contraception. The ACA excluded churches from the requirement, and a later Supreme Court ruling, in Hobby Lobby v. Burwell, extended that exemption to corporations owned and operated by families.

But the new Trump regulations propose to extend exemptions to “conscience-based,” religious and moral objections to a larger, more wide-ranging variety of employers.

“The Trump rules set the stage for targeted, discriminatory exclusions of insurance coverage for reproductive care, gender transition care and family health benefits for workers with a same-sex spouse, among other things about which an employer might claim a religious objection,” said Jenny Pizer, senior counsel at Lambda Legal.

Pizer characterized as “deeply worrisome” the Trump regulations’ “effectively limitless religious exemptions.”

The Supreme Court consolidated both cases out of Pennsylvania, both of which were lost by the Trump administration at the Third Circuit U.S. Court of the Appeals, where a panel upheld a national injunction issued by the district court to stop the new Trump regulations from taking effect.

The regulations sought to enable a wide array of employers to deny coverage for procedures, by saying they have “conscience-based,” religious, or moral objections.

The National Center for Lesbian Rights and GLBTQ Legal Advocates and Defenders (GLAD) joined other civil rights groups in a brief at the appeals court level. They argued the Trump regulations would provide an exemption to “nearly every employer or university with a religious or moral objection from complying.”

dez directly to inquire about the banning and marked pages in October. She also did not reply.

“Based on the summary provided by the review committee and a letter provided by the district council, it was determined by previous district leadership that the books would not be required reading,” yet the statement Holden sent to Yahoo Lifestyle states, “[H]owever, all the books, including Love is Love were made available for student self-selection in the teacher’s classrooms during the 2018-2019 academic year and remain accessible.”

Mansell’s concern seems misplaced, as if the censoring occurred in the library and not the classroom, mentioning in the statement that there are 1,500 LGBT books in the district. Her statement ended with “No recommendations were ever made to pull, ban or censor any books by the Irving ISD Library Services department or any Irving ISD librarian. Irving ISD is a forward thinking, inclusive district where all student voices are represented.”

This is untrue. It is a lie. That “review committee,” as Mansell calls it in the statement, consisted of these people: the division director of curriculum and instruction, the director of digital learning and learning resources, the library services coordinator with 18 years as a librarian and a high school librarian with 13 years of librarian experience.

So librarians were involved in the banning texts from a classroom curriculum, which is somehow justified because the materials would still be available for students to independently find and read as choice reading. But still they supported the curriculum ban.

Their fear of reprisals or fear of taking a stand to fight for the book is inexcusable. As a masters of library science student, I am ashamed I worked for a district where this happened.

One of my professors called librarianship a radical procession during my first semester. And that has stuck with me in times when I have wondered about how these librarians could lend their voices to the suppression of ideas and views for all by supporting the censorship, now about more books than Love is Love. They failed not only students, they failed the profession.

Revelle and I fought the ban once we secured other jobs, making a formal fight with the Comic Book Legal Defence League impossible. But we used the experience to continue to find answers. Now that the district has gone silent, it’s clear that nothing will change unless more voices speak up.

After this incident a new curriculum policy was created to include a six-week review process with an application to get a book on the district’s approved list instead of allowing teachers to use their judgment as professionals in their field to choose books and texts for the unique needs of the students in their classes. This is a lasting effect from this graphic novel censorship event.

So it is no wonder there are no return emails; there is simply too much damage control to be done. It’s better to simply stay quiet and hope everyone forgets about the poorly-handled censorship that revealed the district’s bias.

Because it is censoring. Censoring...
Waco has honored its hometown hero by naming a city recreation center, a YMCA, a cemetery and an elementary school after him.

Before Johnson entered Congress in 1993, Reps. Jake Pickle, Barbara Jordan, Mickey Leland and Craig Washington worked to honor Miller with the Congressional Medal of Honor. In March 2015, Johnson re-introduced a piece of legislation to grant him the award. He never was awarded that Congressional Medal of Honor. But on Monday, Jan. 20, acting Secretary of the Navy Thomas Modly and Rep. Johnson announced Miller would be the first African-American to have an aircraft carrier named after him.

“The sacrifice and patriotism of heroes like Doris Miller inspired me to pursue public service,” Johnson said. “Though he is deserving of even higher official recognition, including the Medal of Honor, the announcement of the naming of this vessel on Martin Luther King Day could not be more fitting.”

Miller went missing in action in November 1943 during the Battle of Makin when his ship was sunk by a Japanese submarine. Of 900 people on his ship, only 272 survived, and a year later Miller was listed as presumed dead.
Putting out the Trumpster fire

In this season of fires in the southern hemisphere, I am reminded of the one we have burning right here in our country. It has a name, and that name is Donald Trump. And he is systematically burning his way through every moral tenant our nation has held dear. He is, like a wildfire, out of control.

I am also reminded of ways wildfires can be effectively fought. Of course, the most obvious weapon against fire is water. Dousing a fire with enough water will have the desired results. While dousing Donald Trump with water is not an option, we could try to soak him with truth, logic, morality.

Still, my suspicion is that none of that will work. Trump has already shown that he has a very sketchy relationship with morals and truth, so most likely trying to use those against him would have little effect.

Another very effective way to fight fires is to remove what’s fueling it. Cutting fire breaks can often limit the damage a fire can cause. With regard to the Trumpster fire, voting him out of office would remove the fuel. Unfortunately that will take many months, and there is no guarantee we will get a fair election this time either.

The perfect way to stop a fire is to deprive it of oxygen. Fire, is simply put, a very rapid oxidation of a material; without oxygen that can’t occur.

When it comes to Trump, his oxygen is notoriety. He is a narcissist and as such thrives on being the center of attention. The presidency is the perfect place from his point of view in that every move a president makes, every word a president says is news and thus gets attention.

Add to this Trump’s instinctive tactics to garner attention, and you have an out of control narcissist in a very dangerous position of power.

So how do we stave this fire of oxygen?

We can begin by slowing down the amplification of every morally bereft statement or act the man makes. There is nothing to be gained by broadcasting his latest tweet or outrageous statement all over social media. All it does is feed his ego and fan the flames. It also infuriates his cult-like followers, who are never outraged by his behavior, instead finding it the perfectly “refreshing” antidote to the “political correctness” they rail against.

For anyone who is seriously opposed to Trump and his politics, the rebroadcasting of his outrageous behaviors only reinforces the already obvious fact that he is morally bankrupt and a danger to the entire world. Frankly, if you don’t already know that, no amount of information is going to change your mind. And splashing his latest tantrum across social media only gives him the oxygen he needs to keep going.

Though he might not see your posts or your friends’ posts, he does watch polls and trends, and as long as his name is running high in the ratings, good or bad, he is happy.

There is no new information regarding Donald Trump. He is a one trick pony; his tweets and chopper-talk press appearances are all designed to do one thing: focus cameras and microphones on Trump.

So why give him more of what he wants? It’s not like he is going to do anything surprising. He will continue to dismantle our freedoms, attack the bedrock morals of society and lie — lie a lot.

I could successfully make up tomorrow’s headlines simply by imagining how low he could go. I would have a high probability of predicting him correctly, and, frankly, so would everyone else.

It’s time to starve the Trumpster fire of its oxygen. Stop feeding the flames on social media and start doing something to make sure he is doused in November.

Get out and work for a candidate to defeat him. Start working to make the world a better place. Start living your life openly and freely and without the cloud of Trump’s smoke hanging over your head. You will find it a lot easier to breathe.

Political activism matters now more than ever.

If we want change — real change — within our nation, our local communities and even within the LGBTQIA+ experience, it requires real individuals to stand up, be heard and be the impetus for agendas to move forward.

It’s a simple request and demand: We want to be heard!

But being heard is harder than ever before in our nation, it seems, because there are so many different groups and movements that are speaking out. From women’s rights to immigrant rights to rallies wanting equality for human rights — the sheer volume can feel overwhelming.

Sure, we all can make a lot of noise. But that doesn’t mean that we are actually being heard.

For me, I want to be heard in my healthcare experiences. I want the healthcare delivered to me to be personal, designed specifically for me — the exact opposite of community-wide healthcare. And I want my healthcare providers to understand my journey and react specifically to the needs that I have on my journey.

I don’t want to be a statistic anymore, and I couldn’t care less about in what risk pool I’ve previously been placed or grouped. Sometimes the labels and words — like “MSM” (men who have sex with men) and “high risk” (sexually) — completely veil my identity within my own health. And it isn’t okay anymore. I am an individual first, and my healthcare needs to be mine. I want to be heard.

As a cisgender white male, I have substantial privilege, obviously. I completely accept that as neither my fault nor my reward. I cannot affect it. I recognize it, however.

But as an HIV-positive queer trying to navigate healthcare, at times I feel I am losing, I have yet to find health equity — and I’m putting in the work.

More times than not, I believe that lack of understanding of the LGBTQIA+ experience by my healthcare providers is the beginning of the concerns. For me, I am already on the defensive with a new provider as I attempt to explain or recognize whether they are queer-friendly.

That is precisely why I am so supporting of the #WeNeedAButton campaign that is calling for patient-matching websites to include an identifier for queer-friendly medical providers. The simple identification of these providers will reduce the anxiety that I experience from the onset of a medical appointment.

As much as we are told to stand up and fight for social issues, to rise up and speak against inequalities and to do the important work to bring justice and equity to all people, I realize that each of us has the right and need to be heard as an individual in our own personal healthcare — because so much of it happens behind closed doors. The quest to find queer-friendly providers is an important first step in reaching this goal.

We want to be heard. We should be heard.

Let’s fight to make it happen. Join me in supporting the #WeNeedAButton campaign and share your healthcare story as an LGBTQIA+ individual.

The time is now!

The Trump administration’s petition to the Supreme Court argued that the administration was trying to resolve lawsuits brought by “many employers” who have religious and moral objections to certain coverage. The administration claimed the federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act requires its proposed regulations.

The RFRA says the federal government may not “substantially burden a person’s free exercise of religion without demonstrating a compelling interest in doing so.”

But openly lesbian Massachusetts Attorney General Maura Healey led a brief at the district court level, saying states have a compelling interest in “protecting the health, well-being and economic security of their residents.”

The brief was joined by California, New York, Michigan, Illinois, 15 other states and the District of Columbia.

Healey, who is expected to lead a brief on the Supreme Court appeal, too, said her office would “urge the Supreme Court to protect access to no-cost contraception for women across the country.”

“We will keep fighting for equality and do everything we can to protect personal health care decisions,” she said.

Pizer said that Lambda Legal has warned “from the beginning the dangers for LGBTQ and HIV-positive people, and others, of the religious exemption arguments pressed by employers…” . We believe the Third Circuit gave proper answers to these questions and was on solid legal ground when blocking the Trump administration from enforcing its outrageous rules.”

These two cases will likely be argued in March, with decisions coming out in June.

LGBT legal activists also expect the Supreme Court to rule in June — though it could rule sooner — on whether Title VII of the Civil Rights Act prohibits discrimination against employees because of sexual orientation or gender identity. The justices heard oral arguments in October and are expected to issue two opinions on those matters, probably in late June, when the 2019-20 session ends.

For some queer men, it might be a fantasy to strip off all their clothes and writhe around with a bunch of other men. At Radical Yoga, that’s just a weekly thing.

But get your mind out of the gutter. It’s not like that.

Roberto Alvarez Jr.’s studio, inside the Vigor Massage space in East Dallas, is a place where those who are comfortable out of clothes can get their stretch on. But he also wants to provide a safe space for those with some trepidation and curiosity. Ultimately, everyone has his own reasons.

“There are a few things that lead people here,” Alvarez says. “They are either trying to recover from something or do something new. Some try it to be adventurous or just meet new people. But there is space for everybody.”

Alvarez, 29, started his classes in 2017 under the studio’s first moniker Naked Yoga Dallas. He’s revamped his studio to Radical Yoga with its first class, held just last week. Plus, the name seemed a better fit.

“Being naked is a form of being radical. It’s more than just taking off your clothes; it’s the symbolism in layers we have on ourselves,” he explains.

OK, but why yoga in the nude in the first place? The reason goes back to Alvarez’s college days.

Yoga was part of Alvarez’s curriculum while studying dance in college. His interest grew when he pursued his masters at Texas Woman’s University, which also came in handy for another reason.

“Grad school was stressful! I was crying most of the time, so yoga kept me centered,” he says. “But that helped me learn that yoga was not just for the body but also the mind. And then I did my first naked yoga in Austin where I saw men of all different ages and sizes forming community.”

The experience ended up being a profound one for Alvarez. He explains that he learned much about himself in many ways including understanding his own sexuality. Being naked, for him, stripped away more than just clothes, and he wanted others to know the same experience.

“So sure, clothes may get in the way, especially when they get sweaty, but when we just wear ourselves — especially as gay or queer men — to confront our bodies is a big thing.”

Gay culture is bombarded by images of ideal physiques, but gay men are also shamed about their bodies by society, religion and family, according to Alvarez. He sees the act of just removing clothes in this setting as healing.

“Firstly, the world doesn’t end,” he says. “Men will say they can’t do it. I get that. Whatever trauma tells them that, I reassure them that we’re all just doing our best, and that we’re all in this together.”

But there is one important question that just can’t be ignored, because the reality simply that is a boner might just join in on the yoga session. It’s a question Alvarez confronts so often that he’s put it on his website.

What happens if I get aroused?
Nothing. It might be your body’s natural response in this space — and that’s nothing to be ashamed of.

If anything, he flips the script on that whole situation.

“It’s a response from sensations in the body, and maybe on some level a projection, and that’s OK. I think we are afraid of who we are sometimes. Instead, it’s what you do with that feeling. Being aroused is a powerful form of energy, but no one taught us how to use that energy. As a tantric experience, embracing that can release some level of shame,” he says.

Alvarez teaches three types of yoga: hatha, vinyasa flow and yin. He intends

When we talk about “staying healthy,” most of us, especially in the gay community, think about exercise, diet and mastering good habits like quitting smoking. But as essential as body health is mental health.

“Mental and behavioral health problems are widespread among American adults,” says William Shepard, Ph.D., a clinical psychologist with the Dallas practice of Simonsen + Shepard Behavioral Health. As recently as 2018, he says, up to 20 percent of American adults have experienced a diagnosable mental/behavioral problem such as depression, anxiety or substance abuse. And yet, “25 percent of those same adults received no [professional] help, most frequently citing affordability issues, not knowing how to access services and believing they could solve their problems on their own,” Shepard says.

Shepard practices “talk therapy,” also known as psychotherapy, a scientifically-validated approach to treating mental problems. The concept is to provide a supportive, non-judgmental and collaborative environment to work through one’s problems, improve thinking, modify behavior and “learn to live a happier and more fulfilling life.” (By contrast, counseling, he explains, can involve mental/behavioral health problems, but also such things as nutrition, finances, spirituality, etc.)

We asked Shepard to outline for us some of the benefits of psychotherapy and why mental health should be as much a part of your fitness as a trip to the gym.

1. It can help you no longer feel alone. “Many people who develop mental/behavioral health problems are reluctant to tell others about their difficulties, and this fear can be isolating. Often, those suffering with depression, anxiety, or other problems will withdraw from family and friends, making their difficulties much worse. When you connect with a skilled psychotherapist, you’ll likely feel immediate relief that you have a professional on your side who wants to help.”

2. You may realize you aren’t “crazy” after all. “Anyone who tries to tell you that mental/behavioral health problems aren’t real is, at best, misinformed and, at worst, possibly dangerous. A skilled therapist will explain the nature and extent of your problems and give you some ideas about why people develop these difficulties in the first place. Almost everyone who gets into therapy feels relieved when they learn how common their problems actually are … and realize they aren’t ‘crazy’ after all.”

3. You can begin to see “a way out.” “You’ll have the help of a trained and experienced professional, who can guide you to the type of life you want,

WHO DOESN'T LOVE A BIG PACKAGE?
As we cruise into the new year, few places await folks hoping to embrace their resolutions as much as gyms do. Whether maintaining last year’s workout regimen or starting a new one, you need to be at the right place for you. Gyms and fitness centers should be sacred realms where people looking to stay healthy can test their bodies and minds in a safe environment. Most of us like to feel comfortable wherever we workout, a place where few judging eyes stare, so here’s a list of queer-friendly area gyms to check out.

Club Dallas. This specialized 18-and-over Swiss Avenue sauna and fitness center caters to Dallas’ gay men always looking to keep fit and stay well. Just steps away from a DART station, Club Dallas provides its members a full gym, cardiovascular-focused area, whirlpool, steam room, outdoor pool and private dressing rooms. But most important, the Club prides itself as a safe and discreet place for its members to rejuvenate and stay healthy with others. Membership costs $32/mo., with one-time visits costing $8 on weekdays and $10 on weekends. The-Clubs.com.

Diesel Fitness. This uptown gym located in City Place off North Central Expressway offers weekly classes to help members work on their body tone. On Mondays and Wednesdays, the Iron Body Bootcamp could whip any newcomer into shape, and the spot’s Bun’s & Gun’s workout suits the more advanced types on Tuesday nights. And along with the usual fitness amenities, such as barbells and various lift machines, Diesel features a designated space for boxing and an indoor turf. DieselFitness214.com.

Equinox Fitness. For those looking for a facility promoting luxury, Equinox provides high-end equipment and machines, with membership usually running about $180/mo. Locations are in Plano, Highland Park and Preston Hollow for Dallasites of all types. And members can utilize the establishment’s cycling space, personal trainers, Pilates studio and spa, featuring massage and facial stations. Along with purchasing one-on-one training sessions, members can take unlimited group fitness classes for free. Equinox.com.

Gold’s Gym. One of the definitive health centers nationwide, the Uptown branch of this national chain has remained popular in the community for years. GoldsGym.com.

LA Fitness. The sprawling center in the gayborhood, with its pool area, weights, treadmills and more, is perennially popular with queer fitness folks.
by the path that is best suited for you. Early in treatment, a good therapist will help you set goals and will begin tracking your progress. More severe problems may require medication (e.g., antidepressants), and this can reduce some of the worst symptoms. But when thinking or behavior problems are the underlying cause of your difficulties, medication alone won’t help as much as combining it with talk therapy.”

4. You will become accountable for making changes. “Whether that means actually doing things differently, or accepting that some things aren’t going to change for you, a good therapist will hold you accountable for the goals you’ve set, and will challenge you on whether and how often you’re acting on those necessary changes.”

5. You can become a better version of yourself. “Most people who start psychotherapy and stick with it for more than a session or two report tremendous benefit from it,” Shepard says. “Many report that psychotherapy has been transformative for them: helping them to shed regret about the past, be more present in their daily lives, and be more optimistic and hopeful about the future.”

Cookbooks can help you stay healthy

Want to know one of the best ways to stay fit and save money? Make your own meals at home. You can make sure you have fresh, healthy ingredients as well as control sodium, sugar and fats. Plus, it’s just fun.

But we all know this; the problem usually is motivation — how do we get ideas for what to make and have the expertise to come up with something interesting day after day? Having a cookbook or two around will facilitate your time in the kitchen.

Here are some of the cookbooks out right now that have gotten us hovering over the stove lately.

Easy Keto in 30 Minutes by Urvashi Pitre. Keto is one of the hotter health trends in recent years — a diet that focuses on controlling carbs in favor of proteins and “good” fats. If you’ve never fully understood how keto works, though, Pitre does an excellent job of explaining the fundamentals, and also isn’t overly hardcore — there’s always room to accommodate your own tastes and even cheat a little. In addition, the recipes that we’ve tried taste great, including a riced cauliflower “mac” and cheese with bacon and jalapenos, and a luscious take on creamed spinach.

Antoni in the Kitchen by Antoni Porowski. The “food gay” from the new Queer Eye isn’t just nice to look at and helpful to hopeless straights, he has some great ideas about cooking, which you can find in this cookbook chock full of good recipes and attractive photos.

Sexy dancer stays fit at the barre

Name and age: Floyd McLean Jr., 23
Occupation: Professional dancer/teacher
Spotted at: Gaston and LaVista

Dance, dance revolution:
Magnificent, modest Floyd McLean is the middle of three brothers and two sisters born in East Orange, N.J., to a Guyanese father and Jamaican mother. A student of performing arts from elementary through high school, he was very involved in musical theater. During summers, he trained at The Dance Theatre of Harlem's summer intensives; during his sophomore year, he trained with the NYU Future Dance and Dance Makers Program.

Floyd attended Point Park University, majoring in dance, which led to a job offer from the Dallas Black Theatre. Last year, he danced in the Dallas Opera's production of Carmen, modeled at House of DIFFA Extravaganza, and will perform at the Rising Excellence concert on April 3–4 at Moody Performance Hall.

Staying fit: Floyd keeps in shape a with barre classes a couple times a week for cardio, toning and body shaping. His regimen keeps him fit, yet flexible to perform.

Media maven: Floyd's interests include photography, modeling and singing. He is also a media influencer on Twitter @floydmcleanjr and Instagram @thefloydjr. He and his partner have a YouTube channel, Black Boy Joy.

Quotation: "Bloom wherever you are planted." Floyd defines the meaning of this quote as "It doesn't matter where you are or where you're from, you can make it happen with commitment and consistency."
Robyn Crawford talks tell-all book on her romance with Whitney Houston

After four decades of speculation that they were romantically involved, Robyn Crawford has spoken her truth: She loved Whitney Houston. In her heartfelt autobiography released late last year, A Song for You: My Life with Whitney Houston, Crawford shares that their love was real but stifled, a romance that, at first intimate and sexual, wavered as Whitney rose to fame in the '80s.

Whitney and Crawford became friends as teenagers, during the summer of 1980, while both working at the East Orange Community Development Center in New Jersey. Their relationship deepened into romantic love, and finally, with Crawford as Whitney’s assistant, a trusted professional alliance.

A loving, dignified tribute buoyed by Crawford’s generosity of spirit through her many grievances, including the loss of Whitney, the autobiography is the first time Crawford has disclosed the extent of their relationship. It reveals in intimate, evocative detail many lesser-known facts about how Whitney operated and their supportive, tumultuous shared experiences on tour and at home: the rise, the fall, the fallout. The tragedy of Whitney’s death.

Crawford, as depicted in the book, is no saint, either. She’s remarkably forthcoming about the drugs she and Whitney did when they were teenagers. But beyond their longtime relationship is the life story of Crawford, whose tabloid-spun persona was limited to her association with Whitney.

Now, Crawford takes her story back, speaking from New Jersey, where she lives with her wife Lisa Hintelmann and their twins.

— Chris Azzopardi

Dallas Voice: I’m happy that we know your story, not just the story the media’s been telling us all these years. Robyn Crawford: I had a life too, right, Chris?

You did. But as a Whitney fan, the book made me sad. As you were writing this, what emotions were you wrestling with? Shoot. There were many different emotions. Sometimes I felt sad, sometimes I laughed. It was like an emotional rollercoaster. I was reliving the ‘80s and the ‘90s like I was there. I was in it. I just... I felt like I could keep writing. I couldn’t see an end.

Because there were so many more stories? Yeah. It was huge: the experiences on aircrafts, and feeling like the plane was gonna drop out of the sky. The first award show and what that was like. And when it was just us, and not so many people, what that was like. I wrote a lot. I had a very good editor in Jill Schwartzman, but there was so much more of the journey that’s not on the pages.

How did you manage to stay silent on your relationship with Whitney for so long? I cherish those years. We had a bond of trust and loyalty from the get-go. And we made a pact to support each other. I felt good about what I had experienced and the love that I had for Whitney and that we shared. It was always there.

Was it challenging for you to keep that inside all these years? Honestly, I didn’t read a lot of the stuff. People called me and said, “Robyn, did you hear this? Did you see this?” I did not see the documentaries [about Houston]. I had twins, and that kept me busy. I’m guilty of staying focused on where I am, and I did get angry when I heard stuff. Like when Whitney passed, I really was angry and frustrated every time I heard something that was said [about us], but I didn’t know what to say or who to say it to. Once you start talking, you’re just out there, and that wasn’t a comfortable feeling.

Did it feel like a burden to have to keep your sexuality a secret? I think I’ve been saying this: That we never looked at our friendship and our experiences as anything other than, this is me. You were you. And when I say it was open and honest, I mean, we could say anything to each other or just look at each other, and we just knew exactly... we were communicating. But the ‘80s were the time where you were either this or that, and my world at that age was so much bigger as far as adventurous. I had a boyfriend growing up, and I talk about him in the book, and I loved him. He respected me.

With Whitney, she was perfect in every way. Someone that I met, and everything we were doing together was beautiful; it really was. We were having a good time. And I never felt like... I mean, I knew musically and show business-wise, that was a world that we wanted to learn more about and be prepared and ready for, and with that thought, I could see more of, “Boy, if people find out we’re doing this...” because that’s just how it was. And obviously her mother [Cissy] made her feelings clear about our closeness. She didn’t even know how deep we were; she just made it clear that she didn’t like how close we were.

Whitney didn’t seem to mind when you were romantically involved with a man, but when she learned that you were linked with other women, she became jealous and furious. Did you ever question that logic? Whitney didn’t explain things. She just would let me know if she didn’t like something, and she didn’t have a problem asking me to tell this person to leave. I think she felt a certain possessiveness, and it wasn’t like Whitney had a lot of friends. Her life was so like... it was just really me. She was a very private person who didn’t have a lot of friends, who didn’t want a lot of friends. She could’ve had them if she wanted to. She didn’t like to do a whole lot, she was a homebody. So I look at it like that: She was possessive because, really, all she had to do was say, “OK, it’s me and you” [laughs] and it would’ve been, “OK.” But that’s not what she wanted. She didn’t want it like that. And who wants to be with someone or wants to harbor those kinds of feelings when they don’t want that? You better get yourself together. And our love was bigger than that.

Do you think that if she were a part of today’s music landscape, with so many out artists, life might’ve been different for Whitney? Well, you’ve heard Whitney speak and how she always said, “I’m not gay,” and she was tired of answering that question.

You recount her being asked about the lesbian rumors, when she said, “I ain’t suckin’ no dick. I ain’t gettin’ on my knees. Something must be wrong: I can’t just really sing. I can’t just be a really talented, gifted person. She’s gotta be gay.” You say in the book her response was “uncalled for and wrong.” But you never felt her own struggles with her sexuality caused her to spew anti-queer vitriol? You are absolutely right. And no, I do not believe that she was internalizing and projecting — no. Absolutely not.

to host power flow, which he describes as a bit more advanced. Classes currently run $15 and also feature a post-session of tantra (for $10) which dives into meditation and reflection. He also provides private instruction. As his rebranding settles, Alvarez also expects to expand classes for women and workshops to explore queer yoga spaces.

For those coming to his class — especially those with some reluctance or lack of assurance — Alvarez only has one piece of advice: “Have an open mind. It’s OK to feel anxious. That’s a natural feeling. We’re there to help take care of each other.”

Roberto Alvarez Jr., founder and owner of Radical Yoga, describes the different types of yoga his studio teaches.

Vinyasa flow: “This has a New Age feel. There’s a lot of movement with breath. I see it almost as a form of dance going in and out of different poses.”

Hatha: “This removes some of the flow found in vinyasa flow. So we may stand on the left leg and hold a pose as opposed to moving in and out of poses. It’s a very traditional form.”

Yin: “This takes out flow completely and more so targets the connective tissues over the muscles. So when we are holding a butterfly pose, we focus on the inner thighs. We would hold for 3–5 minutes.”

Tantra: Its own thing, this involves couples pairings, though not in a sexual way. “There’s touching, like hand-on-heart poses.”

Jenny Block tackles body issues

I feel like I have always been at war with my body. And I bet many of you feel the exact same.

Body image and weight are sensitive issues. And, let’s face it, ageing puts those issues front and center for the majority of us. Taking care of ourselves and supporting our partners when it comes to appearance can be a challenge — being both honest and kind is a razor’s edge. It can be equally difficult to share our feelings about our own bodies and get the support we need from our partner without hurt feelings.

This problem is often compounded when one partner feels as if she struggles more than the other, or the perception that it’s somehow “easier” for the other (because of lifestyle — like whether one works from home or in an office — or your partner’s personal goals or even metabolism). The thing is, a person’s struggle is a person’s struggle.

The other difficulty is that if we criticize one person feels as if she struggles more than the other, or the perception that it’s somehow “easier” for the other (because of lifestyle — like whether one works from home or in an office — or your partner’s personal goals or even metabolism). The thing is, a person’s struggle is a person’s struggle.

When it comes to how we feel about our bodies, the only thing that really matters is how we feel. It doesn’t matter if someone else tells us we look “fine” or even “good.” It doesn’t matter if we’re “only” struggling with those same pesky 10 pounds, or lingering baby weight, or that spare tire that seems to come and go at will. It doesn’t matter if we can still squeeze into our favorite jeans. If we’re not where we want to be, we need our partner to hear us and support us.

For myself, my own body never looks the way I want it to, and then when I see old photos, I often say to myself with a sigh, “I can’t believe I thought I was heavy then — look at me now.” As I’m getting older, I’m not at all keen about how my metabolism doesn’t seem to be cooperating with me, and how fat seems to have found new, creative places to settle.

My incredibly sweet wife constantly tells me how beautiful she thinks I am, and I appreciate that. But it doesn’t change my own frustration with my weight. When I share that frustration, she can get cross with me, and that’s hard for me, because I need her to hear how I feel about myself, even if it’s not the same as she feels about me. I also want her to be honest, because I need to be able to trust her. If she says I always look good, I won’t know when it’s just the love talking.

The other difficulty is that if we criticize our own bodies, our partners might wrongly take that as criticism of theirs, as in, “If she thinks she needs to lose weight, she must think I really, really need to lose weight.” But we have to be able to hear only what our partner is saying and not create any subtext. Not everything is about you. We have to stop making comparisons. If she is saying, “This is how I feel about me,” it’s imperative we hear that and only that.

We also have to remember that even if we feel as if our ideal is farther out of reach than our partner’s goal, that doesn’t make our partner’s journey any easier or less important. In fact, the last 10 or 15 pounds often are the hardest to lose. If that’s the whole of their journey, that’s no walk in the park. One person having to lose more or change more or whatever in no way discounts what the other person feels they need to do.

The same goes for if one partner is “busier” than the other. If we want to improve ourselves, there is always time and space to do that. No excuse has ever resulted in either toning or weight loss. Only eating less (and better) and moving more can do that. It might make us feel better for a minute to make excuses like, “Oh, he has so much time on his hands. It’s so different for me.” But those excuses hurt no one but ourselves.

Everyone has their own inner demons and their external challenges. Comparisons serve no purpose. Others not being at their ideal weight doesn’t mean we shouldn’t work towards being at ours. Each of us has to decide what we want and need for ourselves when it comes to our bodies, and we have to communicate that to our partners. If I ask if I look heavy in something, I want a real answer. Otherwise, I wouldn’t be asking. And if you ask me the same, I will answer truthfully.

Here’s the thing: We need to be able to tell our partners the truth without them thinking that it means we love them any less. I know my wife loves me, and I need her support as I continue to work to get my body to a state with which I am comfortable. I need my journey to be respected and not minimized, and I need to know when a pair of jeans or a dress need a hiatus before my body is ready for it again.

It’s about not making things about us. My comfort with my body has nothing to do with my wife’s body. My journey is my own. When it comes to body issues and weight, relatively is, well, irrelevant. So, be honest and be kind and hear what your partner is saying without inserting your own needs and feelings into what is being shared. The feelings we have and the battles we have to face are all real and all true, and other people’s feelings and experiences do not negate our own. Ever.
